“ I look upon the Protestant Establishment of Ireland as a fundamental principle of our Imperial Constitution ; I take it to have been unalterably settled at the Union, and that to talk of changing the Protestant religion of Ireland without shaking the Protestant Establishment of the Empire is idle. I speak no new language, now that, for the first time, I have an opportunity of delivering my sentiments in the presence of the right reverend Bench. I utter but the opinions I have entertained and expressed in the other House of Parliament. I think a religious Establishment essential to our well-being, and that, without a dignified Establishment in times like these, religion itself would be degraded. I am, therefore, persuaded, not only that the Establishment is necessary, but that the rank, affluence, and dignity of the hierarchy is important to our best interests. I think, further, that its power and influence are, and ought to be, so great that, unless that hierarchy be connected with the State, it may be too powerful for the State, and hence the necessity of maintaining that connection for the benefit of the State. On these grounds, and not for any fanciful and theoretical reasons assigned by some writers upon this subject, I never for a moment would consent to anything which could endanger our Protestant Establishment. I further feel that the Protestant Establishment of Ireland is the very cement of the Union. I find it interwoven with all the essential relations and institutions of the two kingdoms ; and I have no hesitation in admitting that, if it were destroyed, the very foundations of public security would be shaken, the connection between England and Ireland dissolved, and that the annihilation of private property must follow the ruin of the property of the Church.”—[2 Hansard, xix. 1259-60.]

These men had earned the character of great Statesmen, and their opinion was entitled to great weight. He would next refer to the stringency of the Coronation Oath, and ask any man who read it to put his hand upon his heart and say whether Her Majesty, after taking such an Oath as that, ought to be asked to assent to such a measure as the present? He would read to them the words of that Oath—

“ ARCHBISHOP : ‘ Will you, to the utmost of your power, maintain the Laws of God, the true profession of the Gospel, and the Protestant Reformed Religion established by Law? and will you maintain and preserve inviolably the Settlement of the United Church of England and Ireland, and the Doctrine, Worship, Discipline, and Government thereof, as by Law established within

England and Ireland and the Territories thereunto belonging? and will you preserve unto the Bishops and Clergy of England and Ireland, and to the Churches there committed to their Charge, all such Rights and Privileges as by Law do or shall appertain to them, or any of them?’

“ QUEEN : ‘ All this I promise to do.’

“ Then the Queen arising out of her chair, supported as before, and assisted by the Lord Great Chamberlain, the Sword of State being carried before her, shall go to the Altar, and there being uncovered, make her solemn Oath in the sight of all the people, to observe the premises ; laying her right hand upon the Holy Gospel in the Great Bible, which was before carried in the procession, and is now brought from the Altar by the Archbishop, and tendered to her as she kneels upon the steps, saying these words—

“ ‘ The things which I have here before promised, I will perform and keep ; So help me, God!’

“ Then the Queen kisseth the Book, and signeth the Oath.”

He asked how could any loyal Minister go to Her Majesty, who had so sworn, and ask her to sign the Bill by which he proposed to disestablish that Church, and to rob it of the funds belonging to it—and to bestow part of them on the Roman Catholics? He asked again, what solemn pledge could be held sacred if that Oath was to be violated, and torn in pieces by any Act of Parliament? They talked of the repudiation of the United States, but what repudiation of their National Debt, or what breach of faith could equal or surpass the robbery and confiscation contemplated by this Bill? [“Oh!”] Hon. Members might cry “Oh!” but they could not alter the English language or the plain sense and meaning of words. How could any pledges be held sacred if these were allowed to be broken? There were two characters in the Old Testament—Ahab and Jezebel—of whom many evil things were said, but who only appeared to have lived a little before their time, when their proceedings were read by the light of the present day. They only wanted to buy a piece of land, but, unlike certain Ministers of the present time, they were ready to give any price the owner asked for it. But hon. Members opposite by sheer numbers and by confiscation proposed to take the property of the Church and refused to give that which the Church was entitled to receive for it. A measure of that kind would be such a blot and disgrace upon the so-called justice of England that he, for one, hoped it would never come to pass. They were told that in Ireland the great majority of the population were Roman Catholics and the great minority were Protestants. Leaving out of view that the Protestants owned eight-ninths of the property of Ireland, he contended, that in dealing with the Protestants of Ireland under the terms of the Act of Union, they had no right to reckon the numbers of the Protestants in the one country alone, any more than they ought to reckon the Protestants in any county of England only, and to take the property of the Roman Catholics in such county because they were in the minority there. But in dealing with an Imperial matter, affecting the Established Church of the whole United Kingdom, they should reckon the total number of Protestants and the total number of Roman Catholics for the whole kingdom, and if that were done the latter would be found to be in a minority of fully one to six. But that would not give the Protestants any title to rob the Roman Catholics of their churches and endowments. If they went to the argument of numbers there would be no lack of claimants, because the proportion of those who held property in various parts of England was numerically inferior to the number of those who had none. But such a plea would be the grossest form of Communism and Socialism. There were Noblemen whose ancestors had received gifts from the Crown for eminent public services; and if it were once laid down that what the Crown had given the Crown could take away, a principle would be established invalidating the security, not alone of property thus conferred as public rewards, but of all property held from Parliament or under the Crown. He opposed the policy of the present Bill, because it would revive the smouldering embers of religious discord, because it would alienate a large body of loyal men who were induced to acquire property and to reside in Ireland on the faith of the Act of Union, and because it would not effect the object aimed at—namely, the pacification of the country. It was asserted that with the disestablishment and disendowment of the Irish Church discords would cease. But all who knew the country were aware that the real bone of contention was the land; and even those who merely read the newspapers could not fail to perceive that the settlement, as it was called, of the Church question, would have no influence upon murders and agrarian crimes. The hon.

Sir George Jenkinson

Member read portions of the charges delivered by the Lord Chief Justice and Mr. Baron Deasy at the opening of the Assizes with regard to the large amount of crime undetected, and making special reference to cases, in one of which a farmer, taking a piece of land from which another had been evicted, had his house set on fire; in another case an armed party went to the house of a farmer and threatened to shoot him if he took a specified piece of land; and to a further case in which a letter was sent threatening a farmer if he did not give up a piece of land which he had held for seventeen years. None of these offenders were brought to justice, and the very nature of the outrages showed that they had no connection whatever with the Church. On this subject some memorable opinions had been expressed in the House in 1847. He well remembered the time, for he was quartered with his regiment in Longford, and was called up at three o'clock in the morning to go in aid of the civil power to the place where Major Mahon lay murdered. An hon. Member, speaking in the debate on the Crime and Outrage (Ireland) Bill in that year, said—

“The reason why the law is carried into effect in England, is, because the feeling of the people is in favour of it, and every man is willing to become, and is in reality, a peace officer, in order to further the ends of justice. But in Ireland this state of things does not exist. The public sentiment in certain districts is depraved and thoroughly vitiated. . . . We have in that country a condition of things not to be matched in any other civilized country on the face of the earth, and which is alike disgraceful to Ireland and to us. The great cause of Ireland's calamities is, that Ireland is idle. I believe it would be found, on inquiry, that the population of Ireland, as compared with that of England, do not work more than two days per week. Wherever a people are not industrious, and are not employed, there is the greatest danger of crime and outrage. Ireland is idle, and therefore she starves. Ireland starves, and therefore she rebels.”—[3 Hansard, xcv. 982, 985.]

Those were the opinions of a Gentleman, then an hon. Member, but now holding high office on the Treasury Bench; they were the views expressed by the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Board of Trade. Considering the part which that right hon. Gentleman always took in Irish debates, the great scheme which he himself had propounded for breaking up the estates of the aristocracy in Ireland, and for selling them out in small parcels to persons who were not to pay for them—it was evident that words of such gravity as he had just quoted, falling from the right hon. Gentleman, were entitled to very great weight. The speech from beginning to end would well repay perusal by Members of the Liberal party, and yet there was not one word in it about the Irish Church. It was altogether a delusion to suppose that disestablishing the Irish Church, and robbing her of her revenues, would tend to pacify that unhappy country. If the Irish people were really to reflect upon this matter they would view the proposals of the Government with some suspicion. The Whigs had been in power from 1846 to 1866, almost without a break, and what had they done for Ireland, especially during the last seven years, when they had a majority of 70? If the Irish Church had been the real cause of all the crime, and misery, and wretchedness in Ireland, how was it that the Liberal party through all those years had never once alluded to it? The right hon. Gentleman now at the head of the Government thought the question so remote in 1865 that he never expected to be called upon to deal with it. Now it was with him the question of the hour. In 1865 he held that in any dealing with the Irish Church the Act of Union must be recognized, and must have important consequences, especially with reference to the position of the hierarchy. He now proposed, without any compunction, to set at naught the Act of Union, and utterly to ignore the hierarchy. How could such inconsistencies be reconciled? What was the condition of Ireland when the Whigs left Office in 1866? After their long tenure of power what mark of favour did they leave to Ireland, or what mark of legislation to soothe her wrongs and appease her discontent? Why, they left the Habeas Corpus suspended and the island full of Fenians in open rebellion. After the Fenians had murdered policemen in Ireland, a policeman in Manchester, and had blown up a prison in Clerkenwell, destroying harmless women and children, the task devolved upon the Conservative Government of arresting these turbulent spirits and sending them to prison. No sooner were the Liberals restored to power than they took the first opportunity of releasing forty-nine of these rebels. No doubt, by the time more policemen had been killed, more prisons blown up, and more helpless women and children injured, the Conservatives would be recalled to power to set matters right again. [Laughter.] Hon. Members might laugh, but it was no laughing matter for the ratepayers of the country, who had to bear the expenses—first, of capturing and prosecuting these Fenians, then of keeping them in prison, and, finally, of sending them to Australia—and, perhaps, though he trusted they would be spared that infliction, of bringing them home from Australia again. He trusted that the people of Ireland would remember the story of the introduction of the wooden horse filled with armed men into Troy, and recollect the words of warning which were uttered on that occasion by Laocoon—

“Sic notus Ulysses!”

*Aut aliquis latet error; equo ne credite, Teucri.
Quicquid id est, timeo Danaos et dona ferentes.*”

They should not put their faith in the present occupants of the Treasury Bench; for the measures of which they boasted and which they were prepared to offer were such as to excite only religious discords and feuds, of which it would be absolutely impossible to foresee the result. And, in conclusion, if he might venture to address a few words of warning to the House, he would say, do not by their vote on this question light up the flame of a religious feud, the end of which neither they nor their children would see. Do not, by their vote now, brand the otherwise prosperous reign of our Protestant Queen and darken her page of history with the disfiguring record of the backsliding and abandonment of an integral part of her kingdom to the supremacy of the Pope of Rome. All the old Roman Catholic countries of Europe—France, Spain, and Italy—were even now struggling to free themselves from the thralldom of Papal rule. The teaching of all history showed that wherever such existed it was subversive of all good government and destructive of all civil and religious liberty. Was this, then, the moment for Protestant England to choose to relapse into the age of darkness and bigotry, inseparable from Papal supremacy, from which she emerged centuries ago at the expense of the best blood of her noblest sons. Party claims, he knew were strong, and he was the last man to ignore them. But they were not sent here for party purposes only.

[Second Reading—First Night.]

There were sometimes claims and duties, higher even than those of mere party, and on this occasion the claims of their country, of their religion, of their Protestant fellow-subjects—he would add of their Protestant Queen,—ought to be paramount and to take precedence of all minor feelings. Think only of those higher claims, and be assured that by so doing they would in the end best serve the interests of their party and of their country. Bear in mind that Protestant England awaited their verdict with anxiety, and whatever that verdict might be—be it for weal or be it for woe—remember that their children would reap the fruits of it, and the page of history would record it in irrevocable lines.

MR. BOWRING said, that it was perhaps scarcely necessary for him as a new and inexperienced Member to make any personal appeal for that kind and courteous consideration which he observed the House was always prepared to extend to those who addressed it for the first time; but if any special ground for such an appeal was required in his case, he would venture to base it upon the fact that he appeared there as a real political phenomenon—namely, as the first living specimen of a Liberal Member who had ever been sent to Parliament by the City of Exeter in modern times to assist by his vote a Liberal Colleague. That city had always been considered to be Protestant to the backbone, and until a recent period it had been the annual custom there, every 5th of November, to burn the effigy of the Pope in the Cathedral yard, to the sound of music and amidst universal popular rejoicing. But despite all its Protestant antecedents and all its Conservative sympathies he had been sent by the City of Exeter to that House, in conjunction with his hon. and learned Friend (Sir John Coleridge), to assist in doing a great act of justice to our Roman Catholic fellow-subjects in Ireland, and, incidentally and parenthetically, to assist in executing a great act of justice upon Her Majesty's late Advisers, which, however, they had anticipated by means of "the happy despatch." As an earnest member of the Church of England he had approached the consideration of this question of the Irish Church with a deep sense of responsibility, feeling that where political interests were inconsistent with religious interests, the former must give way to the latter, and nothing could induce him to be a party to any political act which he in his conscience believed to be likely to be injurious to the true interests of the religion which he professed. It was, therefore, with real satisfaction that he found that upon this question his innate sense of common justice and his ordinary political predilections went hand in hand with his religious convictions. The public had been informed the other day by a right hon. Baronet opposite, on a highly convivial occasion, that the present measure was one of spoliation, injustice, and irreligion. He, on his part, looked upon it as essentially one of redress, justice, and, above all, of religion. If any public act deserved the hard words he had quoted, with the accompaniment of cruelty and bloodshed, it was the Irish Reformation. He begged to protest against two assumptions invariably made by the supporters of the Irish Church. The first was that its disestablishment and disendowment were synonymous with its destruction and abolition. He was not aware that when, in a well-known Court, Sir James P. Wilde pronounced a decree of dissolution of marriage, he accompanied that decree by the physical act of knocking either husband or wife upon the head; and he, for one, supported the present measure because he believed that when placed in its proper position as a missionary Church it had a career of usefulness and prosperity before it such as its present supporters had no idea of. The other assumption which he objected to was that separation of Church and State in Ireland must necessarily and logically lead to a similar separation in this country. He did not see why, because it might suit him to walk in a westerly direction as far as Uxbridge, he was logically bound to continue his walk as far as the Land's End and fall over the cliff there. He approved of this step in the case of Ireland, not because he did not agree with the religious tenets of the Irish Church—not because its clergy were not of holy and exemplary lives, but because it was the Church of an insignificant minority and a standing insult to the vast majority; whereas, in England, this state of matters was entirely reversed. Since this question was before Parliament last Session the position of matters had been materially altered by two circumstances—the presentation of the Report of the Irish Church Commission and the General Election. As to that Report, all its recommendations were invalidated by the fatal flaw which appeared at its commencement, where the Commissioners stated that they—

“ Felt bound to proceed without reference to the Resolutions adopted by the House of Commons and upon the assumption that this branch of the United Church shall continue by law established and endowed.”

In fact the Report merely amounted to a second edition, revised and enlarged, of the Church Temporalities Act of 1834. Nor did the Commissioners' suggestions offer the slightest chance of a settlement of this question. The internal re-distribution proposed by them would be absolutely valueless in the eyes of the population of Ireland, to whom the continued presence of one single established Bishop or even the ghost of a Bishop would be intolerable. He apprehended that the House of Lords would scarcely be likely to approve of the introduction of the principle of paid Members of that House, as recommended by the Commissioners—a proposal apparently emanating from the hon. Member for Leicester (Mr. Taylor) whose name, however, was not attached to the Report. Least of all was the plan of the Commissioners for disendowing 200 parishes containing a Church population of 4,359, and with revenues amounting to £37,000 a year, likely to give satisfaction. That large revenue was, at any rate, now spent in the neighbourhood where it was raised, whereas it would, if the Report were adopted, be henceforward sent up to a central office in Dublin and thence sent down again to some more thriving districts a hundred miles away, with which the places it was derived from had no sympathy or connection whatever. The very notion of thus disendowing parishes where there was a large Roman Catholic and only a small Church population was inconsistent with the favorite theory that the special mission of the Irish Church as an establishment was to be a missionary Church, and to propagate the doctrines of the Reformation in places where they were not now admitted. The whole scheme of the Commissioners would indeed abate the existing scandal but leave untouched the fundamental injustice of the present state of things. A few years ago its adoption might have been possible, but now, as in so many other cases, it was “too late.” The only alternatives left to the country were, on the one hand, the endowment of all three Churches, called by hon. Gentlemen opposite, the “levelling-up policy”—and by a right hon. Gentleman on that (the Ministerial) side the “hot potato policy”—and on the other hand the solution proposed by the present Bill. The course pursued by the late Government and the decision of the country had rendered the latter alternative the only feasible one. With respect to the results of the General Election, he begged respectfully to differ from the opinion expressed by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Buckinghamshire, the other night, to the effect that the decision merely meant that the right hon. Gentleman, now at the head of the Government, should be the person to deal with this question. He believed that the verdict of the country went much further, and that it was given in clear and unmistakable language in favour of the disestablishment and disendowment of the Irish Church. As to the statistics of the question, the great inferiority of the numbers of the Church population of Ireland would appear the more clearly if the country were divided into two unequal halves by a line drawn from Sligo Bay on the North-west to Wicklow on the South-east. It would then be seen that of the 690,000 Churchmen, 530,000 were in the smaller half—including nearly 50,000 in the City of Dublin alone—and only 160,000 in the larger half compared with 2,700,000 Roman Catholics, being only 5½ per cent of the whole. Nearly half the total Church population was in four dioceses—Armagh, Clogher, Connor, and Dublin—out of the thirty-two into which Ireland was divided. The percentage of Churchmen to the population had actually decreased in nine dioceses since 1834, and was far less now in the whole country than it was 200 years ago. But the statistics of the City of Dublin itself were especially striking. That City was the seat of a Protestant Viceregal Court; it possessed a great Protestant Defence Association, which kept up the glow of Protestantism in the Irish breast by means of the Kentish fire; it faced full upon Protestant England, and was almost within reach of the Protestant breezes wafted westward from the hills of North Warwickshire. Yet it appeared that in

Dublin the number of members of the Established Church, which had been 61,833 in 1834, or 26 per cent of the population, had fallen off in 1861 to 49,116, or only 19½ per cent; whilst the Roman Catholic population had increased from 174,957, or 72½ per cent, to 196,495, or 77 per cent. He could not better express the causes of the failure of the State-Church system than in the following words which had been placed in his hands:—

“If the great design of its existence be to convert a nation of Roman Catholics into a nation of Protestants it has lamentably failed. After the centuries, during which it has enjoyed all these supposed advantages, the Irish Church is in as decided and as hopeless a minority to-day as when it first commenced its work. In no country of Europe has the Roman Catholic priest more absolute sway, in none is the faith which he inculcates held with a more passionate devotion. When the Irishman leaves his native country, and is freed from the influence of its surroundings, his loyalty to his Church is often shaken; but in his own land his feelings are so irritated by the signs of Protestant ascendancy, that Protestant appeals lose all their power. With all the warmth of a generous nature he clings to a Church whose sufferings have endeared it to his heart; with all the fervour of patriotism he hates its rival, which he regards as the enemy alike of his race and of his creed. Protestantism is to him the synonym for Saxon oppression, and thus its ministers, however distinguished for personal excellence, fail to exert upon him any favourable influence. Instead, therefore, of advancing, the State-Church has hindered the progress of Protestantism.”

He commended to the attention of the Irish Bishops and clergy the noble words used by the Bishop of Aberdeen, who spoke as follows in his pastoral charge of last Autumn:—

“It does not require any great sagacity to predict that this kingdom and this Church are on the eve of great changes. In our position we who may be spared for a short time will be able to look quietly on, our Church having, centuries ago, passed through these very changes, which seem now to be imminent to the religious Establishments of this land. We have passed through the storm which swept away from us all our earthly things. But it could not affect the Divine authority of the Church, and during the quiet of succeeding years the Church has gradually been recovering from her depression, and now that we have survived our evil days, when I look around, I, for one, do not regret that our Church is free, and dependent upon the zeal and love of her faithful members. Our increasing prosperity may be an encouragement to Churches who have to depend upon their divine constitution, in the promises of God, and the alms of the faithful, instead of the authority of the human law, and the favour of earthly Princes.”

He rejoiced to see the language employed on this grave subject by that distinguished Prelate the Bishop of Down, and he believed that we should soon see many of the Irish clergy prepared to endorse the opinions of the Protestant Archdeacon of Tuam, who had just published a pamphlet, concluding with these words—

“By observations like these, gathered in an experience of more than thirty years in the Church’s ministry, I have been led to the conclusion that we, her members, for our own sake as well as for that of the whole nation, would do well to descend, of our own accord, from our privileged position, and to lay willingly on the altar of our country a portion of that wealth the abuse of which has been the just occasion of our Church’s reproach, and the very use of which has been to her a source of weakness. How dignified, nay, how grand a position would her Bishops and her clergy occupy, were they seen approaching the Throne with the prayer that Her Majesty, with the co-operation of her Parliament, would restore peace to a distracted country, and a feeling of security to a threatened Empire, by placing all her subjects in Ireland on a footing of complete civil and religious equality!”

If he (Mr. Bowring) were a member of the Irish Church, and anxious to make the best possible terms for himself in a worldly point of view, he would far sooner trust to the provisions of the present Bill, than to the tender mercies of the hon. Gentlemen opposite. He remembered the story which was told of the famous Admiral Benbow, showing how, when he was a young man, he first attracted the attention of the world to his deeds of prowess. He was said to have once entered the port of Cadiz having in his possession a large bag, which he refused to allow the Custom House officers to open, saying that it contained provisions for his own consumption. They believed it to contain contraband articles, and to end the dispute he was brought before the magistrates. On the latter ordering him to open the bag, he quietly undid it, and forthwith there rolled out of it upon the table, before the eyes of the astonished magnates, thirteen well-salted heads of pirates whom he had slain in action, with fierce resolution inscribed upon the brow of each; and when the ghastly sight had filled the Spaniards with the needful degree of awe, he quietly replaced the heads in the bag from which they had fallen. Now if he (Mr. Bowring) were the member of the Irish Church he had spoken of, and if the present Bill were rejected and the present Government retired from Office and were succeeded by the hon. Gentlemen opposite, he should expect to witness a modern edition of this story of old Benbow. He pictured to himself some modern Benbow rising on the Treasury Bench, and producing from his official box and placing on the table of the House thirteen well-preserved heads of compromise on the subject of the Irish Church, with "Resolution" inscribed upon each, and bristling with safeguards in every direction; with a dual vote for Bishops in Convocation here, personal payment of tithes there—and so on; and then, when the sight of these thirteen Resolutions had failed to inspire the House with proper awe—and in that respect the parallel failed—he should expect to see the gallant Admiral in charge of the vessel of the State quietly put them back in the official box, and—after two or three Cabinet Ministers had resigned, and a whole Sunday had been spent in investigating the statistics of the question—re-place them by a Bill for the abolition of the Irish Church pure and simple, with no safeguard, compromise, or compensation whatever. He (Mr. Bowring) unfeignedly rejoiced that the first vote of importance which it would be his privilege to give in that House would be a vote in favour of social progress and of religious equality; a vote in accordance with the solemn verdict which had lately been returned by the vast majority of the people of these realms; a vote responsive to the appeal for justice now being imploringly addressed to them by 4,500,000 of their fellow-subjects in the sister Isle; and lastly, and most of all, a vote in direct furtherance of the best and truest interests of that Divine religion which bade them do unto others as they would others should do unto them.

MR. BRODRICK said, he should have been contented to give a silent vote against the second reading of the Bill, were it not that the question it involved was regarded with the deepest interest by the large constituency he had the honour of representing. He believed they had arrived at a stage of that discussion when they were acquainted with the main facts and the leading bearings of the question. The First Minister of the Crown, in submitting his measure to the House, dwelt with becoming gravity on the momentous issue which was proposed for their decision, and on the importance of the results which might flow from it. Hon. Gentlemen opposite must admit that they could justify the measure they were now asked to read a second time upon three considerations only—namely, first, that in their view the situation of Ireland at the present time was such as called for what had been termed "heroic remedies"; secondly, that the heroic remedy peculiarly called for by the situation of that country was the disendowment and the disestablishment of the Irish Church; and thirdly, that the scheme proposed by the Bill of the right hon. Gentleman was the most fitting mode in which the disestablishment of the Irish Church could be carried into effect. Now, he was prepared to join issue with hon. Gentlemen opposite on every one of those points. He denied the accuracy of their premises, and, even if their premises were correct, he denied the soundness of the conclusion which was drawn from them. He would deal with the arguments in the order in which he had stated them. In the first place, he was prepared to contend that the state of Ireland at the present moment—although it was far from being all they could desire—was also very far from being one in which she stood in need of "heroic remedies." That was a point on which he was ready to acknowledge that it was not enough for any man to state the results of his individual experience; but he was fortunately able to appeal to documents of public interest and which admitted of public verification. He took the Returns of the Poor Law Commissioners for 1867-8—the last year for which they had been laid upon the table—and from them he found that the condition of the labouring class in Ireland had never at any other period been so prosperous. The Irish labourers were at present better housed, better fed, better clothed, and they were incomparably better paid than they had been twenty or even ten years ago. There was a total absence among them of those wasting diseases which at one time were wont to devastate the country at short intervals of time—small-pox had almost entirely disappeared from among them, and cholera and dysentery were much less fatal than they were in former years. Under these circumstances it could scarcely be disputed that the condition of the working classes had greatly mended. Then as regarded the tenant-farmers, it appeared that they paid their rents with a regularity and cheerfulness which had formerly been unknown. The deposits in the banks, which consisted for the most part of the savings of the agricultural classes, had never been larger than they were at the present moment, and there could not be a better proof than that of the general prosperity of the country. He next came to the state of the commercial classes, and in reference to that subject he had been informed that in all the larger departments of commerce there was nothing which could be said to approach to stagnation. He was aware that in the smaller towns there had been considerable depression in trade in consequences of circumstances to which he would afterwards advert. But although Ireland was still at least fifty years behind this country, they must not draw a hasty conclusion from that circumstance. They must not look at what she might be but at what she had been; and he said there were evident signs of improvement among every portion of her population. Then he came to the next point. If Ireland did not stand in need of "heroic remedies" at the present moment; if, as he believed, she merely required rest to become the country she might be—rest from political agitation; rest from being made the stalking-horse of parties; rest from being used as the lever—he employed the phrase in the sense in which it had been used by the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Board of Trade—by which right hon. and hon. Gentlemen were to be transferred from one side of the House to the other—what had she to gain by the present measure? What would Ireland gain by the disestablishment and disendowment of the Irish Church? Who had asked for such a remedy? People might suppose from the language of some Gentlemen that Ireland had at one time been happy, contented, and prosperous. They seemed to forget that three centuries and-a-half elapsed between the time of Henry II. and the Reformation. If Gentlemen wanted information on the subject let them refer to the pages in which the late Mr. Hallam, the Tacitus of our day, amused us, with his usual historical impartiality, and with more than his usual terse felicity of language; that sad history of wrong, outrage, and robbery, and this at a time when the Reformed Church of Ireland had not come into existence. He might be told that there was another cause why they should resort to these "heroic remedies," and that was Fenianism. He had possessed as close an opportunity of making acquaintance with Fenianism as any man in that House except the hon. Member for Cork (Mr. Maguire), and he would challenge any hon. Gentlemen on the other side to point out any proclamation, manifesto, or circular, issued by the Fenians, which made a single mention of the Irish Church. The object of these wretched and misguided men was not to pull down the Church, but to obtain possession of the land. But the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Buckinghamshire (Mr. Disraeli), had told the House what the Prime Minister had not—namely, that the land question must be dealt with, and if they dealt with that the question of the Irish Church might be set aside or postponed to the Greek Kalends. Then as to the scheme proposed by the right hon. Gentleman as a panacea for all the wrongs and miseries of Ireland, the scheme now before the House differed very widely from the scheme propounded by the right hon. Gentleman when he was "starring" it in Lancashire, not merely on the points to which the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Buckinghamshire had adverted, but there were other promises made to the ear which he (Mr. Brodrick) feared would not be realized. One promise that the right hon. Gentleman opposite made was that three-fifths of the property of the Church should be preserved to it. Perhaps it would not be generous to press that point further, because he understood the right hon. Gentleman to admit that all his original figures and calculations were fallacious, and he had to begin afresh. There was one point, however, on which he was perfectly explicit, and that was with respect to the glebes and glebe houses, which he stated it would be unfair to take from the Church. Now, speaking of the South of Ireland, which he was best acquainted with, he could say that the glebes consisted only of a few acres close to the house, with a gravel walk around them, and planted with a few trees. And yet, so far from these being left to the Church, they were to be sold to it only at twelve years' purchase, and any debt which remained upon the house must be taken upon their shoulders by those who wished to possess it. Was that fair or just? It would be utterly impossible in Ireland to let them for any thing approaching their value. The only thing that rendered them valuable had been the generosity of the incumbents, who, from time to time, had spent their money upon them; in many cases having built the house; in many more, perhaps in all, having contributed to its embellishment and to the improvement of the land which surrounded it. But all that was now to be taken from them, or they were to be compelled to buy it at twelve years' purchase. Again, the House had been told that none of the surplus was to be devoted to religious purposes of any kind. Now, he wished to call special attention to the 59th clause, which proposed that the surplus should be devoted to the care of lunatics and other afflicted classes. But hon. Gentlemen opposite knew perfectly well that the clause as it stood would simply hand over the money to the monastic and conventual establishments in Ireland, for they would at once undertake the prescribed duties. Then, there was no provision for inspection, nothing to prevent the institutions becoming denominational, none for Government control—so that £500,000, £600,000, or £800,000 would go into the hands of the convents and monasteries in Ireland. How was it proposed to “gild the pill,” so as to make it palatable? The proposal spoke wonderfully for the right hon. Gentleman's accurate knowledge of human nature, for it went on the principle of “making things pleasant all round,” as the phrase was understood in the railway world. There were five classes, each of which was offered a gigantic bribe—the landowners, the tenants, the clergy—using the word in its largest signification—the Roman Catholics, and the Presbyterians. The landowners were bribed by the remission of the tithe; for, as to the purchase of the tithe rent-charge at twenty-two and a-half years' valuation, they all knew in Ireland that would be simple moonshine. There were but few small landowners in Ireland who lived with prudence enough to make it possible for them to purchase the tithe-rent-charge, and if it were they might buy it at a much lower rate in the Incumbered Estates Court. Then, as to the large landowners, most of their property was settled in strict entail, and the tithe rent-charge could not be bought without a heavy mortgage. He knew several estates on which the charge borne was as large as from £1,000 to £2,000, and there were very few owners who would be prepared to raise a capital sum of £40,000 or £50,000 to make the purchase. The result would be that the alternative would be accepted, and that at the end of forty-five years the tithe would expire by the process which the right hon. Gentleman described. Then, the tenants were to be offered the bribe of the county cess. That would be regarded as a concession, no doubt. In the part of Ireland with which he was acquainted it amounted to about 3*d.* in the pound; but when the rent came next to be settled, whether it went upwards or downwards, the diminution on account of the county cess would be taken into consideration, and he was sorry to say that it, too, would find its way into the pocket of the landlord. Then there were the clergy, who were to receive a life provision which they might commute. But not one in ten would think of commuting it. They would prefer an Imperial guarantee during the term of their lives. If the provisions with regard to Maynooth and the Presbyterians had been extended to the Irish Church it would do much better. Money could be invested in Ireland at 4½ or 5 per cent, and the result of the present proposals would be that the Roman Catholics and the Presbyterians would, at the rate of fourteen years' purchase, be in possession of a capital sum amounting probably to about seven-tenths of what the grant was now. But with respect to the clergy, if they should commute they could not expect anything like fourteen years' purchase, and even that would be a very scant measure, because in Canada, where the same process had been carried out, they got sixteen years' purchase, and money there could be invested at 7 and 7½ per cent. The two other classes—the Presbyterians and the Roman Catholics—were dealt with on nearly the same footing. They would both receive a large capital sum, which they would be at liberty to administer in whatever way they thought proper, and they would retain something like seven-tenths of the income they now derived from the State, in addition to which the Roman Catholics had the prospect of obtaining, through the medium of their religious communities, the lion's share of whatever spoil might remain after the other parties had been satisfied. There was one class who were utterly lost sight of in the course of these arrangements—namely, the laity of the Established Church in Ireland. Every possible arrangement was made for the comfort of all other classes concerned; but the laity were to see their Church stripped naked and bare, and then sent forth into the world to eke out a miserable subsistence from voluntary charity. It was the fashion to say the Established Church in Ireland was composed of the wealthiest and most well-to-do part of the population. But what were the wealthiest and most well-to-do people in Ireland in comparison with the same classes in England? Professional incomes in Ireland were not one-half of what they were on this side of the water; the incomes derived from trade and commerce were probably not above one-third of those gained in England; and the money spent in every district, except perhaps in the immediate neighbourhood of the large towns, was probably not one-fifth of the sum spent in districts of the same area and size in England. He would test the results of that measure by the diocese with which he was best acquainted—namely, that of Cork, Cloyne, and Ross. What was the state of the western division of the county of Cork? In the eastern division of that county it was true there was a considerable sum for the maintenance of the Church in almost all the larger parishes, and that, in many cases, where the income was large he was afraid the congregation was small. But in the western division the case was quite different. There, in many instances, there existed a large Protestant population, with a considerable proportion of poor in each parish, while the endowments were now very insufficient. But what would those endowments be when the property of the Church was taken away? A great number of people there must then either be left without the means of spiritual instruction, or would have to be massed in centres so large, that to attend the services of the Church on Sunday they would have to travel ten, fifteen, and even twenty miles in some instances. There were but few resident gentry there, and it would be absolutely impossible to keep up public worship unless some endowment were provided. That was not all. Within the last six years £37,000 had been raised in that diocese by the efforts of influential laymen, and expended on the churches, glebe houses, and the restoration of the cathedral, on the faith that the services of the Church would be provided for out of the property from which for the last 300 years they had been sustained. But the endowments for maintaining those services were about to be taken away, and he said it was not common honesty to ignore the fact that that large sum had been contributed within six years by persons who could ill spare it, on the faith of those arrangements being continued, to which it was now sought to put a summary end. He would take another case. He could point to a parish which was formerly a union in the east of the same county. That union was divided, because it was found that one clergyman was in receipt of the tithes of more than one parish, and that the duties of those distinct parishes—three or four in number at one time, he believed—were, as might have been expected, inefficiently done. What followed? Two churches were built, each at a distance of about three miles from the mother church, partly by the Ecclesiastical Commissioners, and partly from local resources. He did not say that the congregations of either of those churches were large, but the churches afforded the means of grace to those who would otherwise have been practically without them; and that money had been raised, and those churches built, on the faith that the arrangements now in force would be continued. But they were going to undo, in that instance, everything that had been done within the last twenty-five years by the Ecclesiastical Commissioners with the sanction of the Government, and they would place that parish in a far worse position than it would have occupied if the change now proposed could have been contemplated as likely to happen. He would give one more illustration. The borough of Bandon Bridge—now, for the first time for thirty years, represented by a Gentleman on the opposite Benches—was composed of two parishes. The tithes of the larger parish of the two amounted to £600 a year in all. £300 of that sum was enjoyed by the parson, who had a population of about 1,750 Protestants, from 1,300 to 1,400 of whom belonged to the Established Church. That clergyman had no glebe house; he had two curates, and after paying the rent of a house to live in, and paying also his curates, his income from the parish amounted to the magnificent sum of £20 per annum. For upwards of 200 years he and his predecessors had done the duty of that parish, and the remaining £300 a year belonged to a lay impropriator, the rector, a nobleman well represented in that House, and well known in the country. He believed the hon. Member for Bandon (Mr. Shaw) owed his return mainly to the influence—he did not say the improper influence—of that Nobleman. At all events, his agent was one of the most active—he would not say the most unscrupulous—supporters of that hon. Member. But this he did say, that it was a shame and a scandal if the Church was to be deprived of her property in that parish, for which she had done duty for three centuries, and if the head of the house of Cavendish was to continue to receive his £300 a year as lay impropriator. He did not wish to put the matter in an offensive light, but that was a curious anomaly; and he could not see that the Duke of Devonshire had any better title to his moiety of the tithes than the poor parson who had done all the work. He had now to thank the House for allowing him to enter his earnest and heartfelt protest against a measure fraught, he believed, with infinite mischief to the future not only of Ireland but of the great Empire of which she formed a part. He said that the Bill before them, revealed as it was in all its naked deformity, was not a measure of conciliation, nor one of equitable compromise, but, as the hon. and learned Member for Richmond (Sir Roundell Palmer)—whose voice would, he hoped, be heard in that debate—called it, it was a measure of confiscation. He said, moreover, that confiscation was simply an euphemism for an act of monstrous wrong and robbery. The hon. Member for Bradford (Mr. Miall) had declared with something of prophetic vision that the right hon. Gentleman at the head of the Government was treading on the verge of a wide region of change. Wide, indeed! so wide that its limits were altogether beyond the reach of human ken. And now, in conclusion, he would remind the House that there were times and seasons in the history of most nations, as also in the lives of most individuals, when the fabled choice of Hercules was presented to them—when on the one side there lay the broad and easy downward path of political expediency, along which the merest tyro might run with ease, and when on the other side lay the steep and narrow track of duty and of principle, which it would tax all the energy and all the ability of the full-grown statesman to climb. But on the choice which was then made, on the question whether the good was chosen and the evil refused, was wont not unfrequently to turn the future of that nation or of that individual, as the case might be; and should a fatal mistake be made in that choice, repentance, when it came—as with time and reflection it was almost certain to do—would in all probability come only when it was too late.

MR. DILLWYN said, the right hon. Gentleman who opened the debate (Mr. Disraeli) declared that it was not his intention to say anything personally offensive. He (Mr. Dillwyn) accepted that declaration, as he could bear witness to the courtesy with which the right hon. Gentleman had always conducted the debates in that House. But at the same time the right hon. Gentleman had that night used strong language when he characterized this Bill as one of sacrilegious spoliation. The hon. Gentleman who had just sat down called it a great “wrong and robbery.” The right hon. Gentleman, however, favoured the House with his notion of the difference between confiscation and spoliation. As he (Mr. Dillwyn) had always been in favour of such a measure as this, he wished to deny the applicability of this language. He did not consider the measure to be an act of spoliation. He viewed the Established Church in Ireland as a standing wrong to the people of that country, and, being such, he thought the Government of this country only discharged a duty in endeavouring to remove it as soon as possible. He was aware that some Gentlemen took a view of the Church which would justify them in thinking that its disendowment would be an act of spoliation. Those who believed the Church to be a

Divine institution teaching infallible truth by means of an infallible priesthood, might well be of opinion that to interfere with its property would be spoliation and robbery. In his judgment, however, that was a superstitious view of the question, and would not bear examination. He could not agree with those who held that the Church in this country had never undergone a revolution, but that it was the Church of St. Augustine still. To him this seemed like special pleading; as, after the Reformation, the Church—having separated from the Roman Catholic Church—practically assumed the position of a new Church. [“No, no!”] Such, at all events, was the common sense view in which it was regarded by most of the people of this country. In Ireland especially the Church stood in this position; and was, in fact, a standing protest against the doctrine of the infallibility of Churches. [“Question, question!”] Well, he would put away the question of the infallibility or Divine origin of the Church. He looked upon it as a mere State institution—as a public property, of which the public had a right to resume the user when in the public interest it appeared necessary so to do. In all countries, whether the Government was constitutional, mixed, or republican, the supreme power of the State exercised the right of dealing with all sorts of property, whatever it might be, when it interfered with the interests of the community generally. Both private and corporate property had to subject itself to this power; and everybody in this country knew to what an extent the rights of private property were interfered with when railway companies, upon the plea of public necessity, required it. Whether that interference with private and corporate property was right or wrong, he was not going to argue; he only stated the fact; the power of the State in this respect was every day exemplified, and he could not understand why the exercise of that power should only be termed spoliation and robbery when applied to the Irish Church. The Government now proposed to deal with the Church in Ireland. He looked upon this Church in the light of a trust committed by the State to a certain body; and the State having subsequently ascertained that this trust had failed in its purpose—that instead of promoting peace and good-will amongst the people, it had produced the very opposite effects in Ireland—the State had a right to resume that trust, and to administer the property connected with it in a manner more in harmony with the wants and feelings of the people. The failure of the trust, he admitted, was not so much owing to any shortcomings on the part of the clergy as to the inherent vice of the institution which the present measure proposed to disestablish, and the right hon. Gentleman at the head of the Government had therefore dealt not only liberally, but munificently, with the interests of that clergy, and he (Mr. Dillwyn) rejoiced he had done so. In conclusion, he must say he should never give a vote with greater satisfaction than the one he intended to give in favour of the present measure.

MR. W. SHAW said, he wished to make a few observations, as he felt he had been pointedly referred to by an hon. Gentleman on the Opposition Benches (Mr. Brodrick). He had listened with great gratification to the speech of the right hon. Gentleman who opened the debate that evening, and he confessed he had learned some things he had not been acquainted with before, and other things that enabled him to see what the result of the proposed change would be. He had been instructed upon one point in particular—namely, that they need not trouble themselves discussing the principle of the Bill, and that the sooner they entered into the consideration of its merits the better. He must enter a protest, however, against that style of oratory, which seemed unable to get on without the use of words of five syllables at least. He (Mr. Shaw) had not the slightest doubt, if he had Johnson's Dictionary before him, he should be able to hurl upon hon. Gentlemen words of equally “learned length,” and such as would equally apply to the points under discussion. If the right hon. Gentleman could show him that the Bill of the Government dealt in any particular unjustly, or even that it failed in generosity in its dealing with those whom it affected, he would, without hesitation, vote with the opposite party, and against his own on this question. From the commencement of the controversy he had endeavoured to look at it as much as possible from the point of view of an Irish

Churchman. He said of an Irish rather than of an English Churchman; for, in point of fact, there did not seem to exist much sympathy between the English and the Irish Churches; indeed, he had lately seen some publication in which the Irish Church was spoken of as a kind of mongrel Puritanism. The Irish Churchman will also recollect that it was English Churchmen who had originally placed his Church in the false position she occupied for the aggrandizement and political purpose of their own party. Also one of the arguments now most frequently dwelt on was that this measure would imperil the existence of the English Church; so that it would strike the Irish Churchman that you are thinking much more of yourselves than of what is for the best interests of the Irish Church. Looking at the question practically, two proposals might be submitted to Parliament with a view to the settlement of the Irish Church difficulty. One was to carry out the recommendation of the Irish Church Commission, which would reduce that Establishment by one-half, and no doubt that could be done; but if they thus reduced the Establishment they must apply the surplus funds to some other object, for the misuse of property was desecration. Its proper use was consecration. His opinion was that Irish Churchmen ought without hesitation to reject the settlement proposed by the Irish Church Commission and accept that of the Government. He ventured to say that if any gentleman went over to Ireland, and met the thinking, intelligent members of the Church, excluding, of course, clergymen and ladies, he would find them ready to give their votes for the Bill before the House rather than of one founded upon the recommendation of the Commission. Now, see the position in which such a measure would leave the Church. Still all the vices of the present system, an object of dislike and jealousy to seven-eighths of the population, suspended between earth and heaven, and still exposed to the hostile attacks of political parties, what would this Bill enable the Church to do? Of course when it passed, as pass it would, the Church of Ireland would organize its governing body—that governing body would arrange with the incumbents and the Government to commute the life annuities for a fixed sum—they would deal with certain classes of clergymen whose services they could dispense with, such as the very old, the delicate, those who had independent means and were desirous of living elsewhere. Thus they could get rid of considerably more than half the ministers with much less than half the fund, and they would have left, the working clergymen of the Church and a large fund; and, by a moderate effort, supplementing the fund, they might keep it nearly intact; the only thing that would lessen it would be the providing retiring allowance for these clergymen in their old age. He was quite sure, and he spoke from extensive knowledge of Ireland, that the Church would be better officered, and its work much better done with less than half the number of its present ministers. An hon. Member had remarked, in the course of the debate, that by the action of this Bill the Church would be turned out into the cold. He had for a long time studied this question from a belief that this measure must sooner or later come upon the Irish Church, and he believed that Providence had been preparing it for this great event, and he rejoiced to say that no Church had made greater strides in organization and everything to fit her to take her position as a free Church, and her ministers among ministers were highly gifted and excellent men. He agreed with the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Buckinghamshire that the Maynooth and Presbyterian Grants should not be provided out of Church property, and if the right hon. Gentleman moved that the £1,100,000 should be placed on the Consolidated Fund he (Mr. Shaw) would support him. In passing a great measure of national conciliation such as this, he thought it was desirable to rise above considerations of bare justice and to act with something like generosity. He was, therefore, of opinion that both the Presbyterians and the Roman Catholics had some claims on the House. The Presbyterians were an industrious and an intelligent community, and it would not, in his opinion, be an unwise course to adopt to make some provision for assisting them in providing manse and places of worship in poor districts. The Roman Catholics of the South and West of Ireland were also an industrious as well as a religious people, and their clergymen devoted themselves zealously to the improvement of their flock. Their chapels were in many instances miserable buildings, and the residences of the priests but too frequently unfit for educated gentlemen to live in; so that it would be but right for the House to consent to make some provision in that direction as well as for the Presbyterians. It only remained for him to say he heartily supported the Bill.

MR. CROSS said, that he had anxiously and honestly considered this question, and he had formed an opinion upon it irrespective of party feeling. He agreed with the right hon. Gentleman at the head of the Government, that a greater and more arduous task had never fallen upon a Government or that House than that immediately under consideration; but he was afraid that, lost in the greatness of the work they had undertaken as regards the Church, and absorbed in the details of their measure, they had been drawn away from what, after all, was the main object of the Government—namely, the pacification of Ireland. This Bill would certainly destroy the Church in Ireland, but it would not strengthen or improve Ireland. It was a powerful and ingenious instrument for destruction; but that was not the object which the House and the country had in view, they wished rather to render Ireland a happy, peaceful, and a contented country. This subject ought to have been accompanied with a broad outline of the policy of the Government towards Ireland, including the land and education questions. Now, he had endeavoured to look at the proposal of the Government as far as possible from an Irish point of view. The question must be considered in a generous spirit, with a view to discover what was, on the whole, the best for the country. The hon. Member for Cork (Mr. Maguire) in his well-known speech, had drawn a doleful picture of the state of Ireland. He painted it as a country in which a strong force of soldiers and policemen could hardly preserve order. The suspension of the Habeas Corpus Act had deprived the people of their liberties; trade and manufacture was declining; in all respects Ireland was declared to be going backwards. But what, on that occasion, was the first Irish grievance put forward by the hon. Member? Not the Church, but the land question. And when the hon. Member came to touch upon the ecclesiastical part of his subject, it soon appeared that the real grievance was not the existence of an establishment, but of a Protestant Establishment; not that there was a State Church, but that that was not a Roman Catholic State Church. In a word, it was not a grievance of the people of Ireland, but of the Church of Rome. He thought that, in undertaking to legislate for Ireland, the Government ought not to have confined itself to the question of the Church; the House was entitled to know also what, if any, was their policy with regard to the land. For his own part, he entirely differed from the melancholy view of the Member for Cork. He believed that Ireland was in a state not only of great but of rapid improvement. No fair estimate could be formed upon a short review of ten or fifteen years; the growth or decline of nations required a greater space in which to exhibit itself; but if they compared the state of Ireland at intervals of ten years for the last half-century, her material and moral improvement would be placed beyond all question. On the three vital points of national progress—wealth, education, and diminution of crime—Ireland was now infinitely better off than she was fifty years ago. She still required rest—to be let alone—remedial, but not violent legislation—time in which to recover her strength and energy; and he believed that no greater mischief could befall her than such a violent shock and disruption as would be produced by this Bill. One main cause of the evils under which she had suffered was that her population was greater than a mere agricultural country could maintain. It was a fallacy to suppose, with the President of the Board of Trade, that the division and subdivision of the land among the peasantry could cure this evil. The case of Belgium—which was sometimes quoted—offered no true parallel. In Belgium there were large manufacturing towns, which afforded a market for agricultural industry, and an outlet for the superfluous population of the rural districts. In Ireland were none of these things. If Ireland were well stocked with manufacturing towns the establishment of small holdings would be an efficient remedy for the ills which afflicted her; but she was not a manufacturing country, and small holdings would, therefore, help her but little. He believed, with Sir George Lewis, that if Ireland could be stretched out as a sheet of indiarubber the tenantry would be as happy as any in the world; as it was, the population had outgrown the producing power of the country, and want resulted. As Mr. Cobden had said, it had become England's duty to undo what she had been doing in her jealousy and fear of Ireland during the last two centuries. Ireland's commerce and manufactures had been systematically crippled by England, and the Archbishop of Cashel announced with perfect truth that the way to make Ireland prosperous was to develop her commerce and manufactures. In regard to the Irish Church, the Prime Minister had made four charges against her. First, he had described the parishioners in many of the livings as merely an official population; but at the worst that criticism could only apply to the 199 livings which the Commission proposed should lapse after the death of the present incumbents. Secondly, he denied that the grants to Maynooth and the Presbyterians were in any sense—as they had been termed by the Prime Minister—buttresses of the Church of England. The Maynooth Grant was bestowed before the Revolution to prevent the Irish sending their children to France for an education, and the Regium Donum was granted by Charles II. for secret service, and afterwards renewed by William III., not as a buttress to the Church of England but for political services rendered. Nor would he waste time by dealing with the third charge—namely, the waste of funds with which the Church had been charged, in the face of the reckless proposal to confiscate her possessions, and by the manipulations of the Bill to reduce £16,000,000 of property to £7,500,000. Fourthly, stress had been laid upon the Penal Laws which had so long oppressed Ireland, and it was sought to damage the Church by making her responsible for their origin; but the fact was that those laws were demanded equally by Conformists and Presbyterians; they were in accordance with the spirit of that age, and it was unfair that all the odium should now be thrown upon the Protestant Church. He did not consider that the Resolutions passed last Session were binding upon the present Parliament, and respecting them he would remind the House that the Fourth, which affected Maynooth and the Regium Donum, was added afterwards by the House, and was not introduced by the right hon. Gentleman—a fact which probably accounted for the different treatment in the Bill of those grants and the Church endowments. Again, the elections last year were not taken as the simple issue of the Irish Church, for more votes were influenced by the charge of excessive expenditure brought against the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Disraeli) than by the Church policy of the Government. Therefore, notwithstanding the Resolutions of last year, and the elections, and the large Ministerial majority, he trusted that they would still approach this measure not in a party or sectarian, but in a large and generous spirit; and if they did so that measure would not, he was assured, become law, for he was convinced that the more the country understood it, the less it would like it. Two subjects, it seemed to him, had not been fully discussed in the House in connection with this matter, and those subjects were disestablishment and disendowment. ["Oh, oh!"] Yes, he maintained that they had never been discussed as abstract principles, traced to their source, and examined as to their consequences. He wanted to know whether the House was prepared to come to the conclusion, as an abstract principle, that religion should not be established in connection with the State? If the principle were not argued now the result would be that, when they came to argue it in a few years hence, they would be told—"You ought to have taken your stand upon this principle in the debates on the Irish Church." Should we have within the realm of England an Established Church or not? In the words of the right hon. Gentleman and of Sir Robert Peel, at Glasgow, in 1837, he was not prepared to wipe out the name of God from the statute book of England; he believed that every nation as a nation, like every family as a family, should be bound to have some national public acknowledgment of God. They found even in the American States, when they were first founded, that it was declared by statute that it was the duty of the nation as a nation openly to worship God. No one could deny that in discharging its natural duties a Government must go further than the protection of persons and property; and as the Vice President of the Council lately had shown the necessity of attending to the education of the people, so he held it equally necessary that the nation as a nation should acknowledge that which must be the foundation of all education—namely, religion. He, for one, was not prepared to set the example to the age of a departure from the national practice. What was there in Ireland to take it out of the general law? His answer was, nothing. If there was anything in Ireland which prevented the establishment of the English Church there, the only logical conclusion which could possibly be drawn from the arguments of the right hon. Gentleman was that they ought to establish the Roman Catholic religion. A great deal had been said about English interests; but he ventured to say that the only reason why the right hon. Gentleman did not follow his line of reasoning to a logical conclusion was because English interests would step in and would not allow the Roman Catholic Church to be established. Therefore, because he could not do that, the right hon. Gentleman came to the most illogical conclusion to sweep away every religion from the statute book. It had been well said that night that the Church was never put forward by the Irish as a grievance. No Fenians had made complaint of it, and they had not heard of a single clergyman who had been abused or shot at from end of Ireland to another. On the contrary, he believed that the Irish clergy from one end of the island to the other were the men in whom the greatest faith and confidence were reposed by the people. That was shown at the time of the famine; and he agreed with the Dean of Westminster that though by such legislation as was now proposed, the Church might become an aggressive or proselytizing sect, it would cease to be the one religious institution which had constantly fostered liberty of thought and action, and most steadily exerted a moderate and civilizing influence over the whole country. As to the question of disendowment, it was perfectly distinct from that of disestablishment. The property of the Church, as Dr. Arnold—no friend to the Establishment in Ireland—had said of it, was something saved from the scramble for the purposes of religion, and for his part, he was not there to assent under any circumstances, to the taking away of that property. He did not say that there was no difference between the property of a corporation and of a private individual; but he said that they had no right to take away the property of a Church and apply it to secular purposes. Then, too, we should remember that in the case of such a corporation as the Church of England the beneficiaries were not alone the clergymen or the corporation solè, but the vested interest lay in the whole Protestant people. If the Church were disestablished, she should be left in possession of the property which belonged to her, and he regarded the measure as lavish to everybody connected with the Church except those for whose benefit the Church existed. He had cited the case of America. In America, the statutes declared that the property, the churches, and the glebes belonging to the Church of England were to remain her property for ever in spite of disestablishment. Surely, in Ireland the same view of the case ought to be taken. He denied that this was a liberal measure to the Church of Ireland, and he denied that it was a final one. No measure would be final. He thought they had had enough of finality, when they found a Bishop of the Roman Catholic Church saying that he was not content with it, because it left too much in the hands of the Church of England. These were the words of Bishop Goss, of Liverpool, who said he hoped the measure would content the people of Ireland, but he would be very much surprised if it did, because he did not see how the Prime Minister could allow the Established Church to carry off all her private endowments, while he did not give back to the Roman Catholic Church the property that had come to her through private endowments. No measure would be final which 700,000 people believed to be a measure which treated them with gross injustice. He wished the House to consider what would be the position of the Irish Church if the measure passed in its present shape. The right hon. Gentleman spoke of three periods, during which the process of disendowment was to take place. What would be the position of the Church during the first period? There were 700,000 Churchmen scattered over Ireland, from one end to the other, and they were now told to do that which by law it was illegal to do—to form a Convocation of some kind or other; and unless they could satisfy the Queen that they had formed a proper representative body the Government would have nothing to do with them, and all their churches would be taken away. It was not only unjust but positively cruel to tell people who had hitherto been forbidden by law to meet, and who had no experience in meeting, to tell them that they must meet within eighteen months, and that if they were not prepared within six months after to say what churches and what glebes and glebe lands they were prepared to take over, they would not get anything. And were there no dangers to be apprehended from within? Could there be any time more dangerous to call people together than when they were smarting under a sense of injustice? But he would come to the second period which the right hon. Gentleman had sketched out. The right hon. Gentleman undertook to provide for the life interests of clergymen. He supposed it would be admitted that a person who held a freehold office in Ireland was at present entitled to hold it without permission from any person; but if the Church representative body decided not to occupy a particular church, that church became vested in the Commissioners, subject to the life interest of the incumbent, who, according to the proposition of the Government, was not to receive his income unless he performed his duties in that church; so that, though he might be willing to officiate in some other part of Ireland for the same income, he was compelled to remain at a place where his services were but little required. Then they were told that the Church was to retain all the private endowments she had received since 1660. But why did the right hon. Gentleman stop there? It was a new thing to say that the older the tenure the worse was the title. And so with regard to the churches themselves, he wanted to know how much money had been spent in the repair and enlargement of the churches? Did money that was spent on the building of churches cease to be private endowments, though it would have remained private endowment if it had been lodged in the funds? It would be found that 203 new churches had been built in Ireland since 1833. He was aware that the Bill provided that if it could be proved a church was built by a private individual it was not to pass into the hands of a church body. But the churches were built for the most part not by private individuals, but by public subscriptions. Money had been given in this way to the extent of £642,000, exclusive of the £150,000 that had been spent on St. Patrick's Cathedral. Now, he asked, were these private endowments, or were they not? If they were, what right had the right hon. Gentleman to talk of giving them up to the Church, only because they were of no marketable value? There was another question. They were to have their churches, on condition that they would keep them in repair. He wanted to know whether the State would be entitled to come down upon the Church, and to say—"You are not keeping the fabrics in repair, and therefore we will resume them." Again, he wanted to know what title the State would give? They had now a prescription of 300 years; it was proposed to give them instead a Parliamentary title of the date of 1869. What security would that be, if the Roman Catholics were to set up a demand, as he believed they would set up a demand, for these churches? Then, with regard to the glebes and glebe houses? If hon. Gentlemen would refer to Swift's description of the Irish glebes and glebe houses in 1710, they would find that there was hardly anything then in Ireland worth the name. Everyone knew that vast sums of money had since been expended on these glebes, not only by public subscriptions, but by the holders of the livings themselves, who subscribed money out of their own scanty salaries for the good of the Church, and of those who were to come after them. Before sitting down, he must say one word about Maynooth and the Regium Donum. He wanted to know what had the Presbyterians done that they were to be deprived of the money which was so readily and cheerfully voted them by this House? Protestant ascendancy might offend the pride of the Roman Catholics, but there was no ascendancy connected with the Presbyterian Grant. They had done nothing to offend the religious pride of any denomination. What had they done that they should be deprived of the money voted by this House, and which they expended to such good purpose? Then came the matter of Maynooth. He could not make out that the money granted, £26,000 a year, was commuted in the same way as the money belonging to the Church. This £26,000 a year was taken at fourteen years' purchase. The grant to the Presbyterians of £45,000 was taken at such a rate that together they would have £1,100,000 as compensation. The property coming from tithes, land, and other sources, actually paid to the beneficed clergy, amounted to £395,000, and to the Bishops £74,000, making together £469,000. If that was commuted at the same rate as the commutation of the grants to the Roman Catholics and Presbyterians it would amount to far more than £4,000,000. Exclusive of all the glebes, land in occupation, and paying all the charges on property, it would amount to considerably over £6,000,000. Therefore they had not commuted the money paid to the Roman Catholics on the same terms as the money paid to the clergy of the Church. The Roman Catholics were to have the money, and might invest it, and do as they pleased with it. The Protestant clergy were not to have a farthing, except on the condition of performing their duties. He hoped, whatever might become of the Bill, that the Irish Church would never think of making terms with clergymen in order to induce them to give up a farthing out of their small pittance. It had been said—"We are not going to apply the money to other than Irish purposes." But it had been shown that the money was not going to be applied to Irish purposes, but to relieve the Imperial fund of the country. It was said—"We are not going to secularize the money;" but it appeared from statements which had been made public that the question had been discussed in the Cabinet whether the money might not be applied to Irish railway purposes; to the making of bridges or harbours; and, generally, for the relief of the rate-payers. It had been said—"We are not going to give this money to any religious body," but practically the whole management of the funds would, under the Bill, fall into the hands of the Roman Catholics. It was a very bold question, and the end of it could not be seen, as he could prove from the words of the right hon. Gentleman at the head of the Government. The right hon. Gentleman, in a speech which he made at Wigan, used an expression which ought to put the House on its guard with respect to the steps now being taken. Although it did not show the extent to which the Government were going, the direction was clearly pointed out. The right hon. Gentleman said—

"It is clear the Church of Ireland offers to us indeed a great question, but even that question is but one of a group of questions. There is the Church of Ireland, there is the land of Ireland, there is the education of Ireland; there are many subjects, all of which depend upon one greater than them all; they are all so many branches from one trunk, and that trunk is the tree of what is called Protestant ascendancy. Gentlemen, I look, for one, to this Protestant people to put down Protestant ascendancy, which pretends to seek its objects by doing homage to religious truth, and instead of consecrating politics desecrates religion. It is upon that system that we are banded together to make war. It is still there like a tall tree of noxious growth, lifting its head to heaven, and darkening and poisoning the land so far as its shadow can extend."

He (Mr. Cross) asked whether that passage did not point out the direction in which the House was asked to go. First, there was the attack upon the Church of Ireland. But that was not all. There was the land of Ireland; there was the education of Ireland; and if that speech was read by the small light given to them in answer to questions which had been put from that (the Opposition) side of the House, although the Church simply was included in the Bill, there were the land and education questions looming in the distance. So far as regarded the land, the policy of the right hon. Gentleman was shadowed out in his speech as to the pre-emption of the tenant, and the trial of the experiment on a limited scale of the breaking up of large properties. There was also evidence of what was to be done regarding education in the suggestion which had been made respecting Trinity College. He would ask, was the House prepared to go on this downward course without having some policy shadowed out more fully as to the course which the Government intended to pursue? In that interesting book relating to Ireland, written by Mr. Trench, a conversation was related, in which it was intimated by one of the parties that the Church was what might be called a dominant Church, and that if they once get hold of the Church's lands the landlords' lands would follow. If it was intended to take that course, and make open war upon the Protestant inhabitants of Ireland by Act of Parliament, and in any shape or form get possession of the land by the means shadowed out by the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Board of Trade, by giving the tenants the right to purchase over the owners, there would be an end to peace in Ireland. If, on the other hand, they wished to show the people of Ireland that they wanted not only toleration but to live on terms of equality, desiring to live under the same laws, and that there should be some religion established in the realm—he did not say what that religion should be—he believed that the Roman Catholics themselves, and also the Presbyterians, would say that if there was to be any Church Establishment no Church could be established but one—and if it were to be left to the three Churches in Ireland which should be the Established Church, provided they might not choose their own, and provided they were prohibited from choosing their own, the majority would say, it was the English Church that should be established—that the Roman Catholics would not vote for the Presbyterians, and the Presbyterians would not vote for the Roman Catholics. If they went on treating Ireland with justice, in a free, generous spirit, they would rouse a warm feeling in the minds of the most generous people on the face of the earth, and make Ireland happy, and contented, and prosperous.

MR. CHICHESTER FORTESCUE: I wish to congratulate the House upon the delivery of the two speeches to which we have just listened, and to thank the hon. Member for South-west Lancashire (Mr. Cross) for recalling the eloquent words of my right hon. Friend at the head of the Government, which faithfully express the policy of the Government and from which none of us mean to shrink ["Oh! Oh!"]—words I mean, like these—that while there are other great subjects of Irish legislation that have to be dealt with, we yet find one of those subjects before us with which it is our immediate duty to deal—a subject that forms a very large part of that whole, and which is a sine quâ non of all successful legislation for Ireland. Sir, I congratulate the House also on the speech delivered by the hon. Member for Bandon (Mr. Shaw); it was the honest and able expression of a sincere member of the Established Church in Ireland, who told the House his views of the work in which we are engaged, and gave them good reason to believe that that work will do no hurt to the real interests of that Church. But there was another speech which I confess I listened to with admiration, yet with regret—and that was the first speech we heard this evening. To me, I confess, it was a subject of regret to hear the great powers, the remarkable intellect of the right hon. Member for Buckinghamshire, used for the purpose of resisting the great measure which is before us. Remembering the antecedents of that right hon. Gentleman, and remembering the most remarkable speeches that he ever, in my judgment, delivered in his life some years ago, I think I may truly say that if we had not been undeceived by recent experience, we might have hoped that his powerful and naturally unprejudiced mind would be on our side on this occasion. But it was not to be; and although I confess he said nothing that I could trace definitely in support of the Irish Church, dealing in vague generalities and ingenious phrases, the right hon. Gentleman has been the Mover of the Amendment for the rejection of this measure. He has thrown in his weight as Leader of the party opposite, on the side of error and of wrong. I regret, without being surprised, that the right hon. Gentleman and his Friends and Supporters, many of whom I regard with the highest possible respect, should endeavour at this time of day to prolong the existence of a State Church in Ireland. I may safely say that the vast majority of thinking men, and even of unthinking men, in this country have made up their minds that the continued existence of a State Church in Ireland under the circumstances of that country is no longer possible. The marvel, indeed, is that it should have been possible so long. For years and generations it has been regarded by the leaders of opinion at home and abroad as an anomaly and a monstrosity scarcely to be paralleled. ["Oh!"]. Hon. Gentlemen will not mistake me. I speak with strong respect for the Protestant and Episcopal Church to which I belong; but I speak of its connection with the State, and I say that for years and generations its existence in Ireland, under the circumstances of that country, has been condemned by all foreign nations, and denounced by almost all leaders of thought in this country, and has only been maintained so long as it has been, partly by the want of knowledge and of sympathy on the part of the people of this country, and partly, perhaps, by a certain inertness and acquiescence on the part of the majority in Ireland. I fear that some part of that want of thought and sympathy must in candour be attributed to the fact that in this case a great Protestant majority were dealing with the fortunes of fellow-countrymen in another island and professing a different creed. I say this in no invidious spirit, because, probably, if the case had been reversed the result would have been the same. But, I own, dealing with such subjects, I often heartily wish that we could get rid altogether of these denominational and religious names and phrases. We talk of the Roman Catholics of Ireland, but that is only another name for the great majority of the people of that country. If it were possible to get rid of these religious phrases and religious ideas, and to remember that the phrase is simply a convenient and habitual way of describing the great majority of the inhabitants of Ireland, it would tend, I think, greatly to the clearness of our ideas, and perhaps to the correctness of our policy. But, Sir, if the existence of the State Church in Ireland has been prolonged by a want of knowledge and sympathy in this country, I admit it has also been prolonged by a certain amount of acquiescence on the part of the majority of the people of Ireland; and that acquiescence is accounted for—it is the fruit and result of the unhappy history of that country. It has not been till of late years that the Roman Catholics, bowed down by a long series of repressive laws, bestirred themselves to insist on those terms and conditions which, if we were in their place, we should undoubtedly have insisted on—namely, absolute equality with their fellow-citizens. That Ireland has improved, and that the mass of the people especially have advanced in material prosperity, there can be no doubt. I rejoice to admit it. I attribute the fact to a perseverance of some length in that policy which we hope this Session we are about finally to crown. But a majority of the people are not satisfied with that increase in their material prosperity. It is true of nations as of individuals, that they “do not live by bread alone.” None of us in this House ought to deny that a people’s feelings of self-respect have demands which go beyond mere physical and material prosperity, and when they reach a certain stage of progress they make those demands heard. That stage has been reached by the great majority of the people of Ireland, and no stronger or happier proof of it can be given than the fact that they have made demands on their countrymen on this side of the Channel on the subject of religious equality which I am happy to say have been met by the responding voice of the great majority of the people of this country. Well, at last the time has come when it is necessary to deal with this great question. I need not tell the House that no internal reform of the State Church in Ireland would in the slightest degree meet the necessities of the case. I will not, therefore, waste time on the Report of the Church Commission. There is, no doubt, a large amount of useful information collected there for which we may be grateful to the able men who collected it; but as to the proposals of the Commission for the internal reform and re-distribution of the revenues of the Irish Church, I venture to say they will occupy very little of our attention. There are but two modes in which the great end we have in view could possibly be reached; one is the mode of general endowment, the other is the mode of general disendowment. Some eminent men still cling to the first of these two methods. I am not ashamed to say myself that at one time I thought the end might be so attained. But I venture confidently to say that I never treated that mode of proceeding except as a means to a great end—an end that must be attained one way or another, and an end which I never dreamt of sacrificing to the means. But by whatever road we may approach the end of religious equality it must be attained by the Parliament of this country; and as we drew nearer to the object in view, undoubtedly the difficulties in the way of a system of general endowment increased in magnitude, and had even grown into evident impossibilities. There was the difficulty of the distribution of this fund among the several denominations of Ireland. There was the aversion on the part of the Roman Catholics of Ireland to conditions that might be necessary to enforce in the case of large endowments being conferred upon their Church. There was, I was going to say, the hatred of a very large proportion of the people of Great Britain, and no insignificant number of the people of Ireland, of the idea of the creation of new endowments in any part of the United Kingdom, and there was the evident fact that, in spite of the threatened loss of their endowment, a great portion—the most active and intellectual portion—of the Presbyterian body in Ireland were opposed to such an idea. I do not know whether the House is aware of the fact; but it is a striking one, which happened in the Presbyterian Church last summer. The General Assembly of the Presbyterian body in Ireland met last year to discuss the question of general endowment or general disendowment, involving the loss of their own endowment. A resolution was proposed in that body which declared that general disendowment, including the loss of the Regium Donum, was to be preferred, and decidedly preferred, to the general endowment of all denominations in Ireland, including the Presbyterians. That resolution was put to the vote, and was only defeated by a small majority. Some of the most distinguished Presbyterian ministers voted in its favour, and since that discussion the opinion had gained ground that the disendowment policy of the Government was preferable to the other policy, although the latter implied the retention of the Regium Donum. We found no desire expressed by any portion of the public for a general endowment of all Churches. We found, on the contrary—and the fact is most significant—that the late Government, when they attempted in a tentative way to induce the House to entertain that subject, found it necessary to beat a speedy retreat. Theirs was a policy which I once heard described by my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer as a “hot potato policy,” by which my right hon. Friend meant that they had taken up a very warm article which burnt their fingers, and which they dropped with the utmost possible celerity. Well then, Sir, we have plainly seen that there is but one road by which we can reach the end, the equality and justice we aim at—namely, entire disendowment in Ireland. We have entered confidently upon that road. We feel it to be the path of duty, and we hope to pursue it until we have attained the object we have in view. We have heard a great deal of confiscation, and of the sacrifice of religion as a consequence of the Government Bill. If I thought there was any truth in such an allegation I should be the last to support such a policy. But what does confiscation mean? Are we to be told that the State has lost the power and right of dealing with public endowments in Ireland?—the State which 300 years ago diverted these endowments to a use entirely different from that to which they were formerly applied. [“No, no!”] Why, the State imposed theological conditions upon the endowments of the Roman Catholic Church which limited them to a mere fraction of the population—conditions which had the effect of making these endowments absolutely useless to the great body of the people, and making them the monopoly of the few. So far from pleading guilty to the charge of confiscation, I should rather say that the change which diverted these endowments to the Church of a minority was an act of confiscation against Ireland, and that what we are about to do is an act of tardy and righteous restitution. Discarding ambiguous and misleading phrases, are we to be told that the Government of Ireland is to be less moral and religious than in times past, because, when we find a State Church existing under circumstances in which it ought never to have existed in Ireland we propose that it should exist no longer? The arguments of the right hon. Member for Buckinghamshire and the Member for South-west Lancashire are based upon the assumption that the State Church in Ireland is in a normal and natural condition. I am not opposed to State Churches on principle. I will only say that there is no institution in the world more absolutely dependent for its justification upon the circumstances of the case and upon the adhesion and sentiment of the people than a State Church. [Laughter.] Hon. Members opposite have forgotten the facts of the case of the Irish Church. They have forgotten the multitudes which lie outside her bounds and reject her ministrations. They have argued like those Whig patriots spoken of by Mr. Macaulay, who were so zealous for all the Whig doctrines of liberty as applied to the Protestants, but gave no thought to the claims—scarcely, indeed, to the existence—of the great mass of the Irish people. So much for the generalities of the case. I now come to the provisions of the Bill, and will briefly refer to a few of the more serious objections made to its principal provisions. In the first place I was surprised to hear the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Buckinghamshire offer the advice he did to the Protestant clergy of Ireland, because it appears to me that more mischievous and disastrous counsels could scarcely be given by the Leader of the Opposition to a great body of his fellow-countrymen. The advice which appeared to be offered by the right hon. Gentleman was that the Protestant clergy should take up the policy of mere resistance, should refuse to have anything to do with the Bill, and reject all ideas of co-operation with the Government. And the right hon. gentleman threatened the Government that if they did refuse to co-operate with them our measure would be a failure. A greater delusion it would be impossible to imagine. The only effect of following that advice would be that very grave and unhappy consequences would result to the Irish Church. The progress of the measure could be in no way defeated. All that Parliament would have to do would be to wait until the last life interest of the Irish clergy had fallen in, and then the end which the Government had in view would be obtained, but by means which the Government would not desire to see adopted, and under circumstances which they would earnestly deprecate. In connection with this subject the right hon. Gentleman has talked of the plan of commutation of life interests as if it were no benefit to the Established Church, and was, on the contrary, rather a slight and insult upon that body. I entirely dissent from that view of the matter. We have endeavoured to treat the Established Church on those principles of policy which have governed the construction of this Bill. If we were to take into account—as I know some persons desire we should do—the personal interest of the minister alone, without regard to the prosperity of the Church, we should be putting that Church in a worse position than any other religious denomination. We satisfied ourselves that it was not our duty to deal with individual dignitaries and clergymen, and that we should not do right in paying them off as if they were officers of some institution that was about to be suppressed, but that it would be proper to continue to impose upon them those conditions on which they now hold their offices and emoluments, and that they should continue to perform their duties. We did not consider the Irish Church as an institution to be superseded or to treat it as Henry VIII. treated the religious houses in his day, when he paid off the members and prevented the continuance of those institutions. We knew that the Church would continue to exist and prosper under the new system proposed by the Bill, and we thought it right to put no obstacle to the transition, and to avoid what might introduce dislocation into its ranks. And, therefore, we required continued service as a condition of receiving compensation from the State. And as to commutation, knowing that you cannot follow a lump sum of money in a man's pocket in the same way that you can supervise an annual income, we required that commutation should not be made without a body fairly representing the Church as a whole being a party to that commutation. The right hon. Gentleman and others who followed him then referred to the question of churches and of glebe houses. I will only say one word about the churches. The hon. Member for South-west Lancashire (Mr. Cross) was in error when he spoke of the churches of Ireland as if they had been mainly raised by private contributions. Of late years there has been a fair amount of private contributions, though not so much as might have been expected under happier circumstances; but the great bulk of the expenditure upon the churches of Ireland has been expenditure of a public character. Parliament has from time to time granted enormous sums of money, amounting, I believe, since the beginning of the century, to something considerably over £500,000. But we need not enter into that, because, by the general feeling and understanding of all parties, the churches, as we know, have been left to the Established Church. With respect to the glebe houses the case is peculiar. There is no doubt that the expenditure upon glebe houses has been one of a singular and complicated character. They also have had their share of public help, partly from Parliament; in some degree they have been supported out of private funds, but not to any very great extent. But considerably more than a moiety of the whole cost of glebe houses has been provided out of the profits of the respective benefices under the Church Building Act, and that fact has led to a controversy of rather a perplexing kind. Upon one side, the side of severity, it may be said that this was a matter which the incumbents were bound to carry out; that no incumbent had a right to the whole profits of his benefice, but that he was bound to provide himself with a residence, and that the Bishop had power to compel him to do so. On the other hand, it is said many of these houses would not have been raised by the incumbents under these Acts if they had any suspicion that what they considered the perpetual lease of the Church was about to terminate. I venture to think that between these two opposing views the Bill before us hits upon an arrangement which can hardly be considered harsh or unfair to any one. The House is aware that the building charge now lying upon the glebe and see houses of Ireland amounts to a very large sum, something like £230,000 or £240,000; and the arrangement is that where there is no building charge upon a glebe house no charge will be made, but that where the building charge does exist there the Church body will be required to re-imburse the State. The payments to be made will be limited to a moderate number of years' purchase of the very moderate value placed on these houses by the general valuation of Ireland, wherever the building charge exceeds that value. That seems to me, upon the whole, a fair arrangement, and one that has been certainly well considered. Another matter, which has been a good deal mixed up with this subject, is the question of glebe lands. And, in connection with this, I should like to explain more fully than was done by my right hon. Friend at the head of the Government the other day the intentions of the Government with respect to a system of loans applicable to all denominations in Ireland, but first to the Established Church itself, for the purpose of providing, where necessary, ecclesiastical residences and a limited quantity of land in connection with them. The quantity of land fixed in the Bill with respect to the Established Church in connection with each glebe house is ten acres, and that, of course, would be the governing amount with regard to loans to be named in the Bill on this subject, which I hope soon after Easter to place before the House. That also would be the amount fixed with regard to all other denominations. The state of the case is shortly this—Under the existing Public Works Act there is, at least in frame and principle, a very large power of lending money to religious denominations in Ireland upon personal security for purposes which are not specified, but which have generally been used, as far as they have been used, for building churches and chapels. The terms, however, were very onerous, re-payment being required within so short a time as five years, and therefore I need not say the offer has not been largely accepted. What we propose to do is very greatly to improve the terms on which such loans will be granted, and to offer them according to the principle of the last Land Improvement Act, the re-payments being spread over thirty-five years. We hope under that offer that all denominations in Ireland, including the Established Church itself, will be able to provide themselves, when necessary, with residences for their clergy, and a moderate amount of glebe land attached to them. That is a system to which Her Majesty's Government attaches very considerable importance. And for my own part, I venture to say that having been led for some time back to take a great interest in this matter by several Friends—among whom I would specially mention one, the hon. Member for the city of Cork (Mr. Murphy), who has written in a very useful and practical sense on this matter—I confess I entertain great hope that this will be found to be a matter of much larger significance and even greater utility than at first sight may appear, and that it will put the clergy of the other Churches in Ireland, both Roman Catholic and Presbyterian, on a far more respectable and desirable footing in respect of their residences than they are now. So much for glebe houses and lands. I now come to the question of Maynooth, on which the right hon. Member for Buckinghamshire has dealt at some length. I confess that when I turn from the vast sums of money which we are about to secure to the Established Church in Ireland—most rightly and justly I admit—

but still vast in amount, and when I look to the large amount of fixed property which we are about to leave with it—I mean the churches and glebe houses—and when I turn to the fourteen years' purchase of the Parliamentary Grant to Maynooth, which is the only point in which the Roman Catholic Church in Ireland has any thing whatever to say to the pecuniary provisions of this Bill, I cannot help feeling a certain painful feeling of disproportion between these amounts. I do not say we are doing wrong; we are creating no new inequality—this is merely the necessary result of those gigantic inequalities which have hitherto prevailed. But still it seems impossible for any fair mind to approach the consideration of the subject without the feeling I have described. We desire to deal with this great educational establishment of Maynooth in a fair and generous spirit. Her Majesty's Government are of opinion that the College of Maynooth is a very special case which deserves great consideration and care. It is a denominational College, but not denominational in any sense to which, I think, the most ardent advocate of united education could object; for it is a College for the education of the Roman Catholic clergy. It is a College which has received in very recent times the deliberate sanction of Parliament under the guidance of Sir Robert Peel. It is a College, I might add, which depends absolutely on the endowments furnished by the State; indeed, if it had not been for this, the Bill would have had no concern with it. If the College of Maynooth had been in any other country in the world it probably would have been in the enjoyment of ancient educational endowments, as Trinity College is at this moment, and this Bill would have had nothing to say to it, just as this Bill has nothing to say to Trinity College, Dublin. Then, we say—Let us deal fairly with this College. Let us remember the difficulties which beset the maintenance of a great centre of education of this kind as distinguished from those local and religious objects, the maintenance of the clergy, and so on, which are comparatively easy. With reference to the case of Trinity College, Dublin, I heartily desire to see within the limits of the endowments of Trinity College sufficient means permanently retained for the education of the clergy of the Anglican Church in Ireland. But if we are to urge to the utmost every argument which can be used for the purpose of cutting down to the last farthing the compensations we are about to make in winding up the affairs of Maynooth as a State Establishment, I do not see how we are to deal as we should wish to do with the Divinity portion of Trinity College, Dublin, without running the risk of exhibiting a very discreditable and unseemly contrast. This House has, we all know, shown considerable jealousy in relation to Maynooth. Under Sir Robert Peel's Act the expenditure for the buildings and repairs of Maynooth was not provided for out of the Consolidated Fund, but the Commissioners of Public Works were constituted by an express clause in the Bill Commissioners for this purpose. That was maintained for three or four years, and an annual grant of, I think, £1,250 was made by Parliament; but one evening a majority of the House refused to renew the grant. Since that time every Government has entertained a wholesome dread of coming into collision with the House on the subject, and has consequently never proposed a renewal of the grant. Maynooth has thus been thrown upon its own resources, and the College has been obliged to borrow the necessary funds from the Board of Works. We propose in this Bill to wipe off that debt and not to call upon Maynooth for re-payment. I venture to say that the whole history of this proceeding affords additional reason why the House should exhibit fairness and consideration in the case of Maynooth. Now, it has been said that these compensations to Maynooth and to the Presbyterian body for the deprivation of the Regium Donum ought to be paid out of the Consolidated Fund—out of the taxation of the country. No doubt there is a good deal to be said in support of that view, but, on the other hand, these great changes are to be made solely for the benefit of Ireland. Ireland will obtain the benefit, Ireland will pay the cost, and Ireland will enjoy the surplus. I think, therefore, that these compensations should be paid out of this fund, which we may fairly regard as the property of the Irish people. Now, Sir, there is one observation with reference to this surplus which was made by the hon. Member for South-west Lancashire (Mr. Cross) which I cannot pass by in silence. The hon.

Mr. Chichester Fortescue

Gentleman said that this surplus would find its way to the Roman Catholics. Well, Sir, I defy the hon. Gentleman to find any means by which you can confer any advantage or good upon the people of Ireland without a large portion of the money expended for that object finding its way to the Roman Catholics. In a country like Ireland, where the Roman Catholics are in so large a majority, if there is to be a fair and equal and useful application of the national property, a very large share must fall to the members of the Roman Catholic Church. Now, there is, I think, only one more point on which I need detain the House, and that is the question which has been touched upon so often to-night — the post-Reformation lands in Ulster, which it is said were given by Protestant Kings to the Protestant Church. Our answer is that they cannot be regarded in any other light than public property. They were either given by the Crown to support the national Church, as I assume the Anglican Church in Ireland was then expected to be, in which case the expectation has turned out to be a failure, or to support a colonial Church, in which case we deny the propriety of such a Church existing in Ulster. For this reason I say that we have no right to draw any distinction between these lands and any other property of the Church. Besides this, it will be evident to anyone who will look into the matter that these were not new grants, but the restoration to the Church of old property of the Roman Catholic Church in Ireland. I put it to the right hon. Gentleman opposite (Dr. Ball), who knows so much upon the subject, whether the so-called grants of the Ulster lands were not in fact restorations? When the Ulster Inquisitions or Commissions issued to ascertain the Church lands which had been gradually appropriated during the troubled times which had passed, are examined, it is found that the denominations of the land in these Inquisitions commonly correspond almost word for word with the so-called grants to the Church; and what we might otherwise imagine to be new grants turn out to be restorations. This matter is not essential to my argument; but it is not without its importance. I will detain the House no longer; but this, Sir, I must say for myself, that, as a member of the Protestant Episcopal Church in Ireland, yielding to no hon.

Gentleman opposite in my desire for her prosperity, I rejoice to witness the time at which we have arrived. I rejoice to have lived to see this great measure brought forward. I rejoice to have been allowed, under the guidance of my right hon. Friend, to bear my share in its preparation. My feelings on this subject have been for many years the same. I can only describe them in this way. I have long felt the Irish Government to be what I may call a Provisional Government. I have long felt that there was something inevitable waiting in the background. We seemed to me to live upon palliatives and make-shifts. I feel now at last that the natural and normal history of Ireland is about to begin. It is true the Bill is sweeping and severe. It would be weakness and folly if it were anything else. It would be the cruelest kindness to the Established Church of Ireland itself if we left anything to be done hereafter—if we missed the great object of reconciliation which we have in view, and threw away the sacrifices which are inevitable in such a case as this. No, Sir, what we say is this—Let there be no Church question in Ireland any more!—no Church question to poison the national life, to set Irishman against Irishman, to turn kindly and liberal men into angry zealots, to give cause for Party Processions Acts, to spoil and pervert the relations between landlord and tenant, and to stifle the active feelings of loyalty in hundreds of thousands of Irishmen. Sir, that is the work we are engaged in. I have the strongest hope and confidence that it will be successful—not in a party sense—but for the permanent good and blessing of the country to which I belong, and I pray, as Lord Macaulay prayed, when terminating a dark page in the history of Ireland—That the future historian may have to tell that what had done the good work in Scotland did the same work in Ireland; and that, under the influence of wisdom, justice, and time, all the various races which inhabit these islands may at last be blended together in one indissoluble union.

PAROCHIAL SCHOOLS (SCOTLAND) BILL.

(The Duke of Argyll.)

(NO. 11.) SECOND READING.

Order of the Day for the Second Reading, read.

THE DUKE OF ARGYLL, in moving that the Bill be now read the second time, said that, as he had fully explained to the House the nature of its provisions when he introduced it, he would not trouble their Lordships with any remarks on the present occasion.

Moved, "That the Bill be now read 2^d."—(The Duke of Argyll.)

LORD ABINGER said, it was not his intention to detain the House at any length with remarks in respect to the principle involved in the Bill, not wishing to oppose it at the present stage; but there were, however, a few suggestions he desired to make on matters of detail.

He was aware that it was not usual to discuss particular clauses of any measure on the second reading, but to wait until the Bill reached the Committee. Yet if the suggestion thrown out, a few days ago, by a noble Earl on the cross-Benches (Earl Grey) was to be carried out, and Bills of this importance to be no longer referred to Select Committees, it would be necessary, he thought, even on the second reading, to consider the bearing which particular clauses might have upon the Bill. There were one or two points to which he begged now to direct the attention of the noble Duke. The first was connected with the imposition of the school rate. The noble Duke proposed to levy a rate of 3d. Now, it was distinctly stated by the Schools Commission that a 2d. rate would be sufficient for all purposes in the rural parishes of Scotland, and also in the principal towns, and that a 2½d. rate would be sufficient for Glasgow and a few of the other large towns. He would therefore wish to ask the noble Duke, not with a view to making any objections to the rate he now proposed, but simply for information, what were his reasons for substituting a 3d. rate for the 2½d. one? He was afraid that if the noble Duke carried out his proposition with respect to this rate by means of an irresponsible Board, and should the 3d. rate be exceeded, he could not perceive how the Bill would enable any ratepayer to obtain a remedy from a court of law, should he be driven to make the application. His next objection was to the clause which related to the conversion of the old national schools into new national schools. There was power given by the Bill for that conversion, and further, there was a very objectionable power vested in the Board to decline accepting these schools should they think fit to become national schools. The effect of that must be that, in liberal parishes where the salaries of schoolmasters had been increased, and where good school buildings had been erected, this irresponsible Board would have the power of objecting to take over these schools and buildings, with a view of proposing an additional assessment of 3d. for their new schools. Now, he should like to know what was meant by the imposition of this 3d. rate. The object of the Bill was to provide for the education of the people, and as all landward parishes would soon have the burden of maintaining the schools cast upon them by this Bill, he thought they had a right to get some information from the noble Duke with respect to this rate. He thought it objectionable that the people of Scotland should be made to pay a double assessment—one by the heritors and the other by the ratepayers—as they would undoubtedly have to do, should this Bill be passed in its present shape. His own opinion was that it would be much better to have only one assessment and one principle contained in the Bill. This 3*d.* rate hardly gave a proper idea of the real amount of taxation which would be imposed by it. He would quote a few figures taken from the Report, which would put very fairly before the country the amount of taxation which the managers and ratepayers would be called upon to pay. The total amount of money levied under the parochial system for all the schools in Scotland in landward parishes was £47,700, and the number of schools supported by these contributions was 1,008, making an average of £47 per school. He found, moreover, that the total amount of rateable property in Scotland, excluding the Parliamentary and Royal burghs, was £10,750,000. Now, a 3*d.* rate upon that amount would raise £134,000, which sum under the present Bill might be raised, in addition to the £47,000 already subscribed by the heritors. In the county of Invernessshire this would amount to an additional sum of £90 on the average in each parish. There was another point which he wished to bring under the notice of the noble Duke. He thought that an additional number of parishes on the West Coast of Scotland might be included in what are called the “insular parishes,” to which enlarged grants might be made by the Privy Council; and he thought that the principle might be further extended to all parishes where the poor rate—which was a good criterion of the prosperity of the parish—exceeded 2*s.* in the pound. Where, on the other hand, the population was so sparse as to make it scarcely worth while to erect a school, he thought the ratepayers should have the power of objecting to the obligation of providing a school. He objected also to the constitution of the proposed Education Board, as provided in the Bill. It was to consist of eight members: two of whom were to be appointed by the ratepayers, two by the conveners of counties, two by the town councils of burghs, two by the Universities, and one by the associated schoolmasters. The other member of the Board was to be the paid servant and nominee of the Crown, and was to act as Chairman with a casting vote. The other Members were not to be paid. Now he held that service which was poorly paid was, generally speaking, very poorly rendered, and that therefore they had no right to ask for gratuitous service. He thought the ratepayers had a right to demand better representation on the Board, and that in fact the principle of representation following taxation should be observed. He had an especial objection to a member being appointed by the associated schoolmasters. The associated schoolmasters were in fact neither more nor less than a trades union, not the less dangerous because its members were educated, and able to get up Petitions, and they already had more influence in Parliamentary elections than it was advisable they should have. Although, moreover, their interests were identical with those of the ratepayers as far as furnishing a sound education was concerned, they were in direct opposition as regarded salaries; the object of the schoolmasters was to obtain as large salaries as practicable, while that of the former would be to pay not more than was consistent with due efficiency. The proposed constitution of the Board was objected to by all noble Lords and Members of Parliament from Scotland with whom he had conversed. What he preferred was that the Board should consist of three members, to be paid by grants from the Crown. One should be the Chairman, as at present proposed, and a nominee of the Government, and have a casting vote; and the others should be elected by the commissioners of Supply or conveners of counties; and the third by the connection of Royal burghs. He trusted the noble Duke would take that suggestion into consideration. He should certainly in Committee oppose that form of Board which was now proposed. Another matter also, he thought, deserved consideration—namely, the retiring allowances to the masters. If they were to be provided for at all, he thought there should be a minimum sum, and that the minimum limit should be £15, with a discretion to the school com-

have a clear explanation. What did they mean by a standard of education? Did they mean that the standard of the Privy Council was to be kept up, or that they were to introduce another standard? Before the Revised Code was introduced in Scotland, there were complaints of the neglect of the elementary branches of education—the acquaintance of the scholars with writing and arithmetic was much inferior to that of English children of the same age, taught in the schools which were under the supervision of the Privy Council. This fact was fully set forth in the second Report of the Scotch Education Commissioners, pp. 99-101. No doubt, it was very disagreeable for a schoolmaster of high attainments to have to attend continually to reading, writing, and arithmetic; but that was only the more reason why they should watch more closely that these branches were carefully attended to. After the Revised Code was introduced, there was a great improvement in these branches. Were they going, then, to throw the weight of the Government in the scale in favour of the higher branches as against reading, writing, and arithmetic? There was another proposal in this Schedule. It was that the endowments should be reckoned as part of the voluntary contributions, and that the Privy Council should give in proportion. He was not going to argue the question of endowments, but he would only say that the principle laid down there was diametrically opposed to the principle laid down in the Revised Code, which was only laid upon the table a short time ago. He wished to know why we are to apply to the people of Scotland a principle entirely different from the principle which they applied to England? He hoped time would be given to consider the Bill, so that they might be able to remedy some of the defects which he had pointed out.

THE EARL OF DENBIGH: The noble Duke (the Duke of Argyll) in his introductory speech on the first reading of this Bill informed your Lordships that its provisions were formed substantially on the recommendations of a Commission which sat in 1864 to examine into the question of education in Scotland. He stated that that Commission was composed of representatives of all the leading religious bodies in Scotland which he enumerated. Among these was found no representative of the Roman Catholics of Scotland, who appear to have been entirely ignored in the matter. It is true that Catholics form a minority in Scotland, but I beg to inform your Lordships that that minority is composed of no less than 300,000 souls, or one-tenth of the population of Scotland, and surely these deserve to have their interests considered in a matter which affects them so vitally. My Lords, I have the honour on this occasion to be selected to represent that minority in your Lordships' House; and I have been entrusted with a Petition representing the grievances under which the Catholics of Scotland would labour if this Bill is carried into effect. It would have been signed much more numerous had there been time; but as it has the signatures of the Archbishop and three Bishops who rule over the Catholic Church in Scotland, and by several of their clergy, I trust it may not be thought wanting in weight. Before reading the Petition—which being short I shall ask your Lordships' permission to do—I will proceed to examine some of the chief provisions of this Bill. There will be a central Board established, of despotic power, ruling on every occasion by majorities which must practically necessarily be Protestant by the constitution of the Board. This Board will have the power of selecting which of the existing denominational schools shall continue to receive a national grant. Judging from the treatment which Catholics have hitherto received from Scotch Protestants in regard to the education of their pauper children, it will not be difficult to form an estimate of the chance their schools would have of selection by this Board. But this is not all. At a given date all denominational schools are to cease and to be "absorbed" in the new national system, and as a guarantee the noble Duke offers us a strict Conscience Clause. Now a Conscience Clause is a necessary concomitant of a denominational system when a very small minority exists in a parish where there is only one school, where a different creed is taught; but in a national system like this proposed, where there may be very large minorities, perhaps even a majority, occasionally professing a different religion to the one taught in the school, who is to see to the proper working of the Conscience Clause? who is to see that the children withdraw, and to what place are they to withdraw, and what are they to do whilst religious instruction is being imparted to those remaining in the school? My Lords, I think I am justified in saying that this Bill was drawn up by Presbyterians for the benefit of Presbyterians, for assuredly both the Episcopalians and Catholics will alike suffer under it. The noble Duke says that the differences among the Scottish Presbyterians are not so much upon doctrine as upon matters of Church government, but I need not tell your Lordships that the differences between them and the Catholics and Episcopalians involve grave matters of vital doctrine. But, my Lords, I look upon this Bill as the thin edge of the wedge by which secular education, as it is mis-called, will be extended hereafter to England and Ireland. If merely elementary education was to be imparted on this system, such as is familiarly denominated the "three R's," I should not so much cavil, but the noble Duke has distinctly stated, in his opening speech, that the higher branches of learning are to be taught, and he instanced by name history and geography. Now, my Lords, if these higher subjects which involve religious instruction, are to be taught in common to a school composed of mixed creeds, either the subjects must be so diluted to suit their scruples as to be practically useless, or else some one's conscience must be wounded. I will give your Lordships an example, which fell under my own notice some few years ago in Ireland, of the value of history as taught under this, the national system, in use there. I was staying at Fermoy with the Bishop, who took me to see his schools. I entered a magnificent school, which, had it not been wanting in all religious emblems, I should have taken for a purely Catholic school, as it was taught by nuns. I was invited to hear the children examined, and history, geography, arithmetic, and other branches of instruction were offered to my selection. I chose history; and, upon being asked to choose the period, I selected the reign of Henry VIII. What was my surprise when the teacher exclaimed—"Oh, we must not touch that. The Government will not allow us to teach the children that there has ever been such a thing as the Reformation."

My Lords, I could hardly believe my ears; but so it was, and history was taught under this system with the cardinal point of English history, the "blessed Reformation," omitted! Am I wrong in calling this history emasculated? And will it not be the same with philosophy? But, my Lords, I will leave what might be thought sectarian grounds, and challenge the whole question on its own merits. I will ask your Lordships to consider well the distinction between instruction and education, for it is by a confusion of ideas on this matter that these errors arise. In what does instruction differ from education? My Lords, instruction is to education what the pencil of the artist is to the finished drawing which he produces thereby. I should like to hear the noble Duke's definition of education. I will give you mine, and I beg your Lordships' particular attention to it, as on this lies the whole gist of my argument. Education is the due development of all man's moral, mental, and physical powers, for the purpose of enabling him to accomplish the object of his creation. Now, then, for what object was man created? I answer in the simple words of the Catechism—"To love, honour, and serve God, and thereby to save his own soul." But how can man do this unless the basis of his education is to instruct him as to the nature and attributes of God, and his duties towards Him? In other words, unless he is taught definite, distinctive, dogmatic religious truth. My Lords, as the noble Duke rightly said—"were there but one religion all education would be easy enough;" but as there are many diversities of creeds, and must ever be where Protestantism exists, there is but one alternative left—namely, to give facilities for every religious communion to teach its own children in that way which will have a hold upon their consciences, and convince them that they have a higher duty than to worship their own selves, and seek their own self-interest above all things. My Lords, would you put edged tools into the hands of children without first instructing them how to use them? Well, the uneducated are like children, and what sharper tool can you put into a man's hands than a sharpened intelligence, the more dangerous if you fail to inform his conscience in the same ratio that you develop his intellect? You will on this system form that most dangerous member of society, that moral pest, an intelligent devil. See what the system is doing for France. Are you prepared to imitate it in this country? You have given an enlarged franchise, and are putting more power into the hands of the people. Cast your eyes around and see who are those that are plotting revolutions and subverting society. Are they not notorious scoffers at religion, if not professed infidels? My Lords, the cultivation of the intellect will do much towards indisposing men to gross and brutal crimes. As we used to learn at school—

"Ingenuas didicisse fideliter artes, Emollit mores, nec sinit esse ferus;"

but if a man is not restrained by some higher principle, that of religious duty, he will succumb when the hour of trial comes. My Lords, I implore you to weigh well the consequences of admitting this principle. If this Bill is to pass a second reading, I trust it may be so altered in Committee as to be applicable to Presbyterians alone, for whom it was evidently intended; and I hope your Lordships will support me in the principle which I have laid down, that education without definite religious teaching is an impossibility, a mockery, and a farce.

THE DUKE OF MARLBOROUGH: It is not my purpose, following the example of other noble Lords, to offer any opposition to the second reading of this Bill; but there are certain features of very great importance in it to which I feel it my duty to call your Lordships' attention. Before, however, I deal with the Bill itself, I think it is necessary to remark upon the peculiar mode in which the measure has been introduced to your Lordships' House. When inquiry is instituted into any subject of great national importance by means of a Royal Commission, whatever may be the recommendation of that Commission, it is generally regarded as the duty of the Government for the time being to take those recommendations into their serious consideration, and, having reviewed them in the light of the exigencies of the case and the peculiar views of those most interested in the result, to introduce a Bill adopting with more or less modifications the recommendations of the Commissioners. I think that upon this occasion a serious departure

has been made from that long-established rule. I do not know an instance of a Royal Commission making any recommendation—however important—without some deviation, at all events, having been made from these recommendations—deviations instituted upon the responsibility of the Government, and better suited to the necessities of the case. But on this occasion we find this very peculiar course adopted—that the Bill relating to the subject of education is not introduced by the noble Lord at the head of the Education Department of the Government (the Earl of Kimberley) upon his recommendation or authority, but that it is introduced by the noble Duke, the Secretary of State for Indian Affairs, whose name appears at the head of the Commissioners whose duty it was to inquire into this most important subject. The Bill is introduced almost verbatim et literatim, word for word, with one exception, and identical with the recommendations of the Commissioners. I have no right to question the discretion of Her Majesty's Government as to what measure on this subject they will propose for the adoption of Parliament; but, at the same time, I must say that the course pursued is altogether an unusual one, and one that betrays very little consideration of this subject on the part of the Government. The first point that strikes me in the Bill is that, while the measure is that proposed by the Royal Commissioners, it almost entirely ignores some most important features of their Report. Allow me to draw the attention of your Lordships to one of them. I believe the general principle included in every Bill presented by successive Governments relating to the education of the people in Scotland was that the true principle upon which these Bills ought to proceed was the extension of the parochial system; and I have been struck with this passage among the recommendations—

"That the most desirable, and, in point of principle, the simplest course would be the extension of the parochial system in proportion to the whole population."

I admit that the Commissioners afterwards profess to see grounds for departing from this wise conclusion; but, after examining the whole Report, I confess I see no adequate ground for this departure. There is one point which particularly strikes one in the Report of the Commissioners, and that is that part which refers to the denominational system; and I cannot help thinking that the Commissioners started with a foregone conclusion that there was a necessity to establish some new national system, and that they contorted and twisted their facts to suit their conclusion. With regard to the denominational system, nothing is more plain in the Report of the Commissioners than that they lay down this particular fact that, whatever the defects of the denominational system in England, at all events they are not apparent in Scotland, and that the denominational system virtually has no effect in impeding the progress of the national system. But in the face of that assertion the noble Duke lays a measure on the table, the whole aim of which is to uproot and destroy the denominational system in Scotland. Now, what will be the effect of this upon the voluntary principle in Scotland? The object of the Bill is to create "new national schools" and "adopted schools." I do not see that the adopted schools are likely to derive any benefit from the change proposed. They are to be subject to the direction of a Board, and they are enabled to act in contravention of any terms imposed upon them by their trusts, while the committee of the schools may call upon them to maintain the school, for which no funds are provided, out of their own pocket. Therefore, if the adopted schools are to take advantage of any provisions of the Act, it can only be with the view to their falling into the system of new national schools. But what will be the effect of this Bill upon the old national parochial schools? By degrees a system of starvation will be set up by which the whole of these old national schools, following out the theory of the Commissioners, will be forced into the system of the new national schools. There are various inducements held out to them to become new national schools. In the first place, the general Board has the power to create new national schools wherever it sees, or fancies it sees, the necessity; and the effect will be that you will have two systems of rating and two committees in a parish, the one regulating the old and the other the new schools, and the effect of this will be that the old national schools must inevitably become absorbed into the new national schools. But what will be the effect of this upon the voluntary system? Your Lordships need only refer to the Report of the Royal Commissioners in order to see what a large amount of voluntary effort there is in Scotland. Collections in behalf of the schools are made in all parts of Scotland, not as in England in particular localities, where the schools exist only, but collections are made by different societies in all parts of Scotland, and then distributed generally throughout the country. But my own conviction is that when the system of rating is established in Scotland, that system will so affect the general opinion of the people in Scotland, that they will say—"Now that we are maintaining schools by rates, why should we any longer put our hands into our pockets to defray the costs of these voluntary schools which have so long continued?" and which I submit are of the greatest possible benefit. But there are one or two other points which I think deserve great consideration with regard to this measure. One of these is the representation of landowners upon the new Council, and this is the point to which I alluded as the one in which a serious departure had been made from the recommendations of the Royal Commissioners. They recommended that there should be two classes of electors; one portion of the committee was to be elected by the owners of property—the representatives of respectability and responsibility—and the other portion was to be elected by the minor tenants and persons, who, no doubt, would be the lowest class of rate-payers. This was an important provision, and one necessary for maintaining the respectability of the schools, and I regret to see that it is omitted in the Bill of the noble Duke. He will, perhaps, say that the central Board has power to make regulations. I am not quite sure that that is clear on the face of the Bill; but I do not think it is a matter that ought to be trusted to the responsibility of the general Board, and I think that they ought to have directions laid down in the statute with regard to the general Board, which it is proposed by the Bill to constitute. With regard to the proposed constitution of the central Board, I agree very much with the remarks of the noble Lord opposite; and I cannot but think that very great confusion and difficulty will arise from the creation of this Board. But in saying this I speak with great deference of the people of Scotland, because I believe it is a part of the measure which has been generally acceptable to them, and, therefore, I only give your Lordships my own individual opinion that it is a system which would be found not to work well. That will be so particularly as the central Board will not be entrusted with the inspection of the schools—which is a point most necessary to enable the Board to judge of those cases where it is important to appoint new masters—but the inspection will continue as now in the hands of the Committee of the Privy Council, and grants are to be made, not to the Board, but directly to the treasurer of the schools. I cannot but think that the existence of the Board will open the door to great abuse, for the members being unpaid, will be very likely to fall under the direction of a clever secretary; and there may be conflicts between the Board and the Privy Council which may prove disadvantageous and inconvenient. One of the greatest objections to the Bill, as it seems to me, is the want of a guarantee for any religious teaching in the schools. The noble Duke, when he introduced this measure, stated that it had the general concurrence of the people of Scotland. I can only say that whatever evidence has come before me in reference to this measure since its introduction has been diametrically opposite to that. I do not mean to say that the people of Scotland are not very desirous of having a measure of education which will be satisfactory to all parties; but there is very great divergence of opinion with regard to this measure in Scotland, and that feeling has been expressed at meetings of the Free Church Presbyterians and other denominations; and if the noble Duke will refer to the newspapers he will find evidence of a large amount of dissatisfaction. But I think that your Lordships ought to contrast the provisions of this Bill with the existing law. The examiners of schoolmasters are chosen from the Universities, and three of them must be Professors of Divinity. The Bill, however, leaves out those provisions, and the examiners may be laymen or not. Then by the Act of 1861, the schoolmasters, although they are not required to profess or subscribe the “Confession of Faith,” or Formula of the Church of Scotland, must subscribe a declaration that they will never, in the discharge of their office, endeavour, directly, or indirectly, to teach or inculcate any opinions opposed to the Divine authority of the Holy Scriptures, or to the doctrines contained in the Shorter Catechism. There is no provision of this kind in the Bill, and no sort of security that the masters profess any religion whatever; yet these schools will soon absorb all the other schools. The noble Duke will perhaps say that in Scotland everybody is so impressed with the importance and necessity of having religious training for their children that it is needless to have a guarantee of this sort, for the school committees will see that proper appointments are made. I think this may be so; but at the same time, there is no provision for requiring a profession of faith from schoolmasters, and there is no power given to the committee, supposing a schoolmaster changes his views, or teaches doctrines contrary to religious belief, to discharge him without the consent of the central Board. I know it is strongly felt by the persons who have represented the case to me to be an objection that there is no security that the central Board will be composed of persons who will sufficiently recognize the importance of religion in the national teaching of Scotland. There is one other point which is of great importance, and which deals very hardly with a large class of schools—the schools at present supported by voluntary efforts. As the Bill stands, after March, 1870, all schools that are not national schools will be precluded from receiving any assistance from the Parliamentary Grant. Thus only one year is allowed for a great number of the schools belonging to the Free Church and other voluntary denominations to range themselves in the class of new national schools. I believe the Free Church has 600 schools in Scotland; and other denominations, though they have a less number of schools, are all of great importance, and working well; and yet, if in the brief space of one year these schools fail to come into the new system, they will be no longer capable of being recipients of the Parliamentary Grant. These are serious objections, and perhaps the noble Duke will endeavour to remove some of them during the progress of the Bill; but as it is not the pleasure of your Lordships to obstruct the second reading of the Bill, I have thought it necessary to bring before your Lordships' attention one or two points which I believed to be worthy of consideration.

THE DUKE OF ARGYLL: My Lords, I am much obliged to my noble Friend who began this discussion (Lord Abinger) for the manner in which he dealt with this subject; because, although most of his observations referred to details, they are details of importance, and we have derived much information from my noble Friend's remarks. Perhaps your Lordships will allow me to follow the points raised by the noble Lord in the order in which they were mentioned, as I shall thus be able to answer the greater part of the objections which have twice been taken to this measure. First, I am asked why the maximum school rate is fixed at 3*d.* instead of 2*d.* or 2½*d.*, as recommended by the Commission. In many parts of Scotland a rate of 3*d.* will be rather inadequate for the purpose, although it will be ample upon the larger rentals of the richer counties. Of course the rate named is the maximum—not the amount which it will be compulsory in every case to raise, but the sum beyond which it will not be competent to go; it is not necessary that the heritors should impose the full rate if they do not need it. I am not quite sure whether it was the intention of my noble Friend to suggest that the maximum might be raised where even 3*d.* is insufficient—if it is, it is a useful suggestion and may be considered. Another point referred to is that of double assessment in the same county. If the heritors' school is insufficient and the Central Board find it necessary to insist upon having another, there will then be a double assessment; if, however, the heritors determine to put their parochial school upon the rates, their exclusive liability will cease, and they will pay simply as ratepayers—and in many of the rural parishes the heritors and their tenants are almost the only ratepayers. The new Bill will follow the principle of the old Scottish law—that of half-and-half assessment. We adhere strictly to our national system—that the rates should be levied from the owner and the occupier, with relief to either party in case he pays the whole. I now come to the additional aid of the Council Grant which is provided for the "insular" parishes. It must be remembered that the insular parishes are very easily defined, but that that is not the case with the mainland parishes. The object of the Privy Council is of course to defend themselves from undue demands on the grant and to give it only where it is necessary. I come now to the question of the constitution of the Board. This is, I confess, precisely one of those points on which each man has his own nostrum. There are probably many different ways of constituting the Board, each one of which will do just as well as another. You might, indeed, shake them all together in a hat and trust entirely to chance for the selection. I have a strong opinion on the subject; but if the House should think that the parochial teachers are not of sufficient importance to have a representative on the Board, I am not wedded to my own plan; and so, if noble Lords think that the ratepayers ought to be strengthened and that the two Members for the Universities should be struck out, though I should not approve such a course, I think that it is a matter of detail that may fairly be discussed and settled in Committee. By that I merely mean to say that, as to these matters, they relate solely to the details of the Bill, and that as matters of principle I attach no importance to them whatever. I certainly think that as the Bill now stands the powers of the Board without any check or control may, perhaps, be more arbitrary than necessary. I should therefore propose that when the Orders of the Board are clearly against the wishes of the ratepayers, the Orders shall not take effect until the Minutes have been laid before the two Houses of Parliament for forty days, when, if no steps are taken against them, they will be acted upon. I should also propose that an appeal should lie from the Orders of the Board to the Secretary of State. I think that these are fair concessions to make, and that the powers of the Board will be sufficiently strong even with the addition of these provisions. I now come to a point of considerable importance, and, I venture to say, very much misunderstood by my noble Friend behind (the Earl of Airlie)—that is, the proposal suggested in the Schedule of the Bill with regard to certain modifications of the Revised Code. I entirely agree with the remark of my noble Friend behind me as to the great value of a Revised Code, even as applied to Scotland. The Revised Code has been introduced into Scotland for the purpose of examination, but it has never yet been introduced into Scotland for the purpose of payment. It has been shown that in Scotland there has been considerable neglect in the elementary branches of education, and we hope that the introduction of the Revised Code will lead to greater attention being bestowed on this department of education. Now, the noble Duke who has just sat down (the Duke of Marlborough) expressed some surprise that this Bill was not introduced into your Lordships' House by the President of the Privy Council. But the course is by no means unusual, for the Public Schools Bill was brought in by my noble Friend who was Chairman of the Commission, and I cannot see anything which should occasion surprise when it was determined to introduce this measure into your Lordships' House, and to intrust it to a Member of your Lordships' House who was also the Chairman of the Commission. However, I am perfectly willing to leave that matter to the opinion of the people of Scotland. Now, with regard to denominational education, I never have objected, and never will object, to the principle of denominational education, except upon one ground, and that is that it is incompetent to overtake the educational wants of the country. I agree in the opinion that in itself and in the abstract it is an advantage that children should be brought up in connection with some definite system of dogmatic teaching. But there is no denying the fact that up to the present time there has been a lamentable deficiency of education in Scotland under a system which may be regarded as at once denominational and national. Let me remind the House that in principle the old national system of Scotland was the system of rating—rating on the owners and occupiers of property; and if that system is intended in the present day you must take all the consequences which flow from the extension of religious dissent. You cannot have a system founded upon rating among a people who are divided in religious opinion without more or less impairing your denominational system. But in Scotland, though the people are frequently divided on points of ecclesiastical discipline, there is, for the most part, tolerable unity in points of purely religious doctrine. The national system of Scotland, by a Bill which was passed some years ago, was separated from the exclusive connection with the Established Church. The masters may be Presbyterians, Episcopalians, and in some cases Roman Catholics. There is, absolutely, no restriction upon the choice of schoolmasters. I am quite aware that in nine cases out of ten—perhaps in ninety-nine out of 100—the heritors of a parish, being members of the Established Church or Episcopalians interested in the support of the Established Church, have elected masters who are members of that Church, but it is quite open to them to elect whom they please. It is, therefore, a fallacy to suppose that the national system of Scotland is connected with the Established Church. With regard to the denominational schools in Scotland at present, the evidence of the Commission went to show that in the majority of cases they have been placed where they are of real value to the people; and where this is the case they will be continued. The principle of the Bill is that the management of the national schools is not interfered with, nor is the management of the denominational schools. Undoubtedly, the Bill provides that after a certain date no new grants shall be given by the Privy Council to denominational schools. With regard to the proposal made by the noble Earl on the cross-Benches (the Earl of Denbigh) I will not deny the force of some of his observations. I am for equality in the case of the Roman Catholics as well as in that of any other denomination; but I do not think that, for the sake of 300,000 or 400,000 Roman Catholics, we should stand in the way of a system of education which will suit all other denominations. Under the old parochial system the Roman Catholics never were coerced, and I cannot see why, under the protection of a stringent Conscience Clause, watched over by the central Board and by the Privy Council, the Roman Catholics should not take their place with all other members of the community and receive secular instruction, receiving at the same time, from their own priests or other religious teachers, such religious instruction as they may think it right to have given to them. But if the objections of the Roman Catholics be such that they cannot receive secular instruction in that way,

I should prefer that they were left as they now are, under the Privy Council, separate, rather than that they should stand in the way of an educational system suitable to all other denominations. I have only to say further, that should your Lordships read the Bill a second time, I shall be prepared in Committee to consider any suggestions that may be made for the amendment of details.

LORD CAIRNS said, he had no desire to offer opposition to the second reading, but he wished for explanations on some points, because the more information their Lordships got on the details of the Bill now, the better would they be able to deal with it in Committee. In the first place, though there could be no doubt that a 3*d.* rate, if levied all over Scotland, would be sufficient for educational purposes, it was, he thought, very doubtful whether, in some particular parishes, that amount would be sufficient for the object in view. He thought, therefore, information should be given as to the parishes where the rating system was to be brought into operation. Again, he wished to know how this and the other House of Parliament were to deal with the question of rate? Here was a Bill which dealt with money in two different ways — first, there was the question of the local taxation, over which the Board was to have control; next, there was the application of the money derived from the Parliamentary Grant for education. The Lordships knew that in their House they were accustomed to take money clauses de bene esse; but that was not the point in this case. Suppose their Lordships passed the Bill through Committee, read it a third time, and sent it down to the other House. In the other House the clauses relating to the rate might be amended, in which case those clauses would come back again to their Lordships as new clauses, and not only as new clauses, but as money clauses. That was the difficulty to which he wished to direct the attention of the noble Duke; because it appeared to him that their Lordships would be powerless to deal with the amount of the rate, or the body which was to exercise the powers of rating. With respect to the constitution of the central Board, as the Bill stood the Privy Council would supply part of the funds, and the central Board would supply the other part. The Privy Council would therefore still exercise a supervision over the schools by inspection, and on the other hand certain powers would be vested in the central Board of Education. Now, it appeared to him that a collision might take place between these two powers; and the mischief was that there was no third body to step in and say which was right. Again, there was a provision that where an Order made by the central Board was objected to, Parliament should decide. The Order was to lie upon the table for forty days, and to take effect after that time, if not reversed. He confessed that he did not think it likely that Parliament would be induced to give its attention to details such as would be involved in Orders of the central Board. There was to be an appeal to the Secretary of State also. He ventured to submit that an appeal to the Privy Council in all cases would be more satisfactory. Something ought to be done with respect to this point. Further, he objected to the two members who were to be returned to the Education Board by the Universities. These members were to be elected by the Councils of the Universities, which were scattered all up and down the country, and had no limited organization; so that there would be the danger of the members not being properly chosen. The alteration he would suggest would be to vest the election of these two members in the University Courts, which consisted of but a small number of thoroughly competent persons, who themselves were elected by the University Councils. That would be a great improvement. In the formation of the local committees he thought it would be better that in the landward parishes they should be chosen by the parochial Board. He wished to know further why the denominational schools of Scotland, which it was admitted had worked well, were to be put an end to?

THE DUKE OF ARGYLL said, the Bill did not propose to put an end to these schools. They were to be adopted under the new system.

LORD CAIRNS admitted the noble Duke had stated that it was intended the denominational schools should attach themselves to the new system, that they should become adopted schools, and should be allowed to be governed according to their former rules; but it was also proposed that this privilege should only be extended to such denominational schools as should be founded within two years after the passing of the Act. The result of this limitation would be to put a stop to the system of denominational schools to a certain extent. It was further provided, with regard to denominational schools already in existence, that they should not be allowed to come in under the new system unless they did so within a year after the passing of the Act. For his part he did not see why the present system with regard to these schools should not be continued. With regard to the parochial school question, it was clear that, notwithstanding the profession in the Preamble that the object of the measure was to extend the system of parish schools in Scotland, the Bill really proceeded to annihilate those schools altogether. In the first place, the name of these schools was to be abolished. In the next place, they were giving a direct bribe to the upper class of heritors to make over these schools to the national schools; because when these proprietors found that they were to continue to be rated for the old schools, and were to be made to pay an additional rate for the new schools, they would naturally seek to amalgamate the two. He would suggest to the noble Duke that it would, at all events, not be an imprudent course to adopt to provide that, before this transfer of the parish schools to the national schools was effected, an opportunity should be given to see how the system worked with regard to the new schools for, say, some two or three years. The noble Duke had not referred to the suggestion of the noble Lord behind him (Lord Abinger) that, if they were going to provide for certain of the parish schools under the new system, the decision as to which of those schools should be adopted should be left to the schools themselves, and not to the local body. He wished, further, to remind the noble Duke that he had not given the House any information with reference to the words of the Schedule relating to the standard of education to be maintained at these schools in future. The words of the Schedule were very difficult to understand, and the question might hereafter arise as to what was the present system of education in Scotland, the standard of which was not to be lowered. He begged that some information might be given to the

Lord Cairns

House upon this subject. It had been stated that the proposals in the Bill had met with general approval in Scotland; but, as far as he had been able to collect information upon the question, the manifestation of public opinion in Scotland did not appear to bear out that assertion. It was certain that the Established Church of Scotland did not approve the absence in the Bill of any provision for religious education in the national schools, while the Free Church in that country had strongly condemned such an omission.

EARL DE GREY AND RIPON said, that the questions raised by the noble and learned Lord (Lord Cairns) would perhaps have been better timed had they been made when the Bill was in Committee. The first point which the noble and learned Lord had taken related to the rate of 3*d.* in the pound. He should be in a better position to afford information upon that point when the Bill got into Committee. The noble and learned Lord, however, would recollect that there was a provision in the Schedule of the Bill that in those parishes where the rate of 3*d.* in the pound was not found sufficient the grant from the Committee of Council on Education might be doubled. The noble and learned Lord had asked what course they intended to adopt with regard to the rating clauses of the Bill. The usual course of striking out these clauses on the third reading would be pursued, a private communication on the subject being made to the other House with reference to them. The noble and learned Lord appeared to think that there might be some danger of clashing between the proceedings of the Committee of Council upon Education and those of the general Board established under this Bill. He, however, did not anticipate anything of the kind would happen, because the general Board established under this Bill had no duties of inspection. The inspection of the schools would be carried on as at present by the inspectors of the Committee of Council on Education, who would make or withhold their grants upon their own principles. The noble and learned Lord asked why it should be the object of this Bill to bring the denominational schools to an end, and stated the feeling which he himself entertained with regard to them. But the overwhelming evidence of the witnesses, ninety-nine out of 134, was in favour of a general or national system; and if there were such an unanimity of feeling on the subject in Scotland, it surely was worth while to make some sacrifices for the purpose of obtaining so great an end as the establishment of one uniform system approved by the people. According to the noble and learned Lord, this was not a Bill to extend, but to destroy, the parochial by altering their name to national schools. But, surely, that was a verbal criticism? The schools, though they might be called national, would still remain parish schools, managed by local authorities and supported by local contributions. The noble and learned Lord also said that this was a Bill to bribe heritors into converting the existing parochial schools into national schools. But if, under the law as it now stood, heritors could recover half the assessment from their tenants, it was only fair that those who paid half the charge should be represented upon the Board having the management of the school. He could not agree with the noble Duke (the Duke of Marlborough) in thinking that the landowners were the only persons who were to be considered respectable. As the object of this Bill was to extend education, it would require a large amount of local contributions to be levied, and it would be obviously unjust to make it a charge exclusively upon one description of property, falling exclusively upon the owners of land, to the relief of the occupiers. The noble Earl behind him seemed to imply that the Revised Code was in force in Scotland; but if that was his noble Friend's opinion he was in error. No doubt the system of examination in Scotland was carried out in the same manner as the system of examination in this country; but from the adoption of the Revised Code, six years ago, down to the present time it had been found impossible for successive Governments to apply it to Scotland in regard to the mode in which payments were made. The most essential and vital principle of that Code—payment by results—was not now, and had never been applied in that country. Having regard to that experience, it was natural to suppose that there must be some difficulties with regard to the feelings of Scotch people which it was very desirable to overcome; and it was precisely for the purpose of enabling that principle to be applied and of overcoming those objections that the provisions had been introduced into the Bill to which his noble Friend took exception. The system in Scotland with regard to primary education—namely, the education of all classes in common schools—had always been widely different from the system existing in England; and so strong was the feeling in Scotland that it would be highly undesirable and mischievous to interfere in any way with that common system that it had been thought advisable to modify the Code so as to secure non-interference with these common schools. Two provisions were to be made on this head—first, that no question should be asked as to the class in life to which the parent of any child in the school belonged; and, secondly, that the subjects now taught in the parochial schools in Scotland should not be materially interfered with. The noble and learned Lord (Lord Cairns) asserted that the words of the Schedule were difficult to understand, and that questions might hereafter arise as to what was the present system of education in Scotland, the standard of which was not to be lowered. But the words to which the noble and learned Lord alluded referred to rules to be approved in the new Code, and the new Code had yet to be made in accordance with the provisions of the Bill when it passed. In the original Revised Code there were six standards, and when the child had passed through the highest he could not be examined again with a view to a further grant being received for him. But by a Minute introduced by the late Government, a child was permitted to be examined after he had passed the sixth standard in any subject which might be taught in the schools: and all that the present Government had in view, recognizing the peculiar circumstances of Scotland, was to extend the Minute of Mr. Corry, so that the further examination should not be confined to one year after passing the sixth standard. They would be very wrong, however, in consenting to that arrangement if they did not make ample provision to secure that the mass of the scholars should receive the elements of a good education, and so guard against the evils which undoubtedly existed before the introduction of the Revised Code.

It was accordingly the intention of the Government, upon the framing of the new Code, to introduce a provision to the effect that payments for the higher subjects should be dependent on a certain number of passes having been obtained by the general body of scholars in the school; thereby guarding against any temptation to the master to neglect the great body of the scholars for the sake of the most advanced class.

Motion agreed to; Bill read 2^a accordingly, and committed to a Committee of the Whole House on Monday the 12th of April.

ELECTRIC TELEGRAPHS.—QUESTION.

MR. SAMUELSON said, he would beg to ask the Postmaster General, Whether a valuation has been made of the total sum which would become payable to the various Telegraph and Railway Companies in the event of the State purchasing their interests under the Permissive Act of last Session, and whether he will lay that valuation upon the Table; whether it is not the case that a large additional outlay beyond that sum would be required in order to complete the scheme of telegraphic communication contemplated by the Post Office; whether the amount of such outlay has been ascertained, and will be communicated to the House; whether the Treasury have caused an estimate to be prepared of the cost of an entirely new and distinct system of telegraphic communication on the most improved plan, under the management of the Post Office, and will communicate such estimate to the House; and, whether or not it is the intention of the Treasury to recommend that Parliament should vote funds for carrying out the Permissive Act of last Session, as well as the additional funds which would be required to complete the postal electric system as contemplated by that Act?

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON: Sir, in reply to the first Question put to me by the hon. Gentleman, I have to state that the valuation of the total sum which will become payable to the various telegraph and railway companies in the event of the State purchasing their interests under the Permissive Act of last Session is in course of being made. The arbitrations which are provided for under that Act between the Government and the telegraph companies are in progress, and it is impossible to make the valuation which the hon. Gentleman asks for until they are concluded. With regard to the second Question, it is true that an additional sum, but not a very large sum, will be required to complete the scheme of telegraphic communication contemplated by the Post Office. The amount has been approximately ascertained, and in the event of the Government going on with the purchase of the telegraphs, it will be communicated to the House. In reply to the third Question I have to say that the Treasury have not caused any estimate to be prepared of the cost of an entirely new and distinct system of telegraphic communication, and consequently none can be laid on the table. As to the last Question, it is, perhaps, rather premature that I should state what are the intentions of the Government until the arbitrations are more advanced than they are now, and the sum which will be necessary is more approximately known. I shall, however, probably be able in a few days to state more fully what the intentions of the Government are with regard to this subject.

Earl De Grey and Ripon

ARMY—THE 3RD WEST INDIA REGIMENT.—QUESTION.

MR. MAGUIRE said, he would beg to ask the Secretary of State for War, If it be not true that the late Paymaster of the 3rd West India Regiment absconded in December, 1866, and that previous to his absconding he forwarded cheques to Officers on outpost duty for the payment of their men, which cheques were dishonoured on being presented, and that the Officers who received these cheques were compelled to pay the men out of their own private resources; and, whether the money so paid has since been refunded to those Officers; and, if not, what are the intentions of the War Office as to its repayment?

MR. CARDWELL replied that the case was still under examination, and if the officers had done all that they ought to do they would of course be repaid.

NOMENCLATURE OF DISEASES. QUESTION.

MR. M'LAREN said, he would beg to ask Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, Whether the statement is correct which has appeared in a medical publication, to the effect that the Lords Commissioners of Her Majesty's Treasury, by a letter dated 10th March, have ordered 20,000 copies of a work entitled Nomenclature of Diseases, to be purchased at the public expense, and distributed gratuitously among the registered medical practitioners of the United Kingdom; whether this work is intended to be adopted or recognized in any way by Her Majesty's Government; and, whether the Colleges of Physicians of Edinburgh and Dublin have been consulted and concur with the London College of Physicians in recommending this nomenclature for adoption throughout the United Kingdom?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EX-CHEQUER: Sir, the medical profession are required to give certificates in reference to diseases for the use of the Legislature. It appears that medical men are not agreed on the nomenclature of disease, so that much doubt and uncertainty arises from the employment of different terms to denote the same disease, and of the same terms to denote different diseases. The London College of Physicians have for many years been compiling a work to remedy this defect. This work is now completed, and it is true that the Treasury has consented to purchase on certain terms—I need not now specify them—20,000 copies of the work, to be distributed gratuitously among the registered members of the medical profession throughout the United Kingdom. The Government do not adopt or recognize this work in the sense of making themselves responsible for the correctness of its nomenclature; but they do so far adopt and recognize it that it is their wish, without pretending to say that it is perfect—and, probably, it would be the first book of the kind that was perfect if it was—that it should be employed generally, in order that the terminology used by medical men should not be such as to mislead. With regard to the third Question of the hon. Member, the Government came to this conclusion in consequence of a deputation that waited upon them, headed by Dr. Alderson, President of the Royal College of Physicians, and Sir Thomas Watson. We have had no communication with the medical bodies of Scotland or Ireland on this subject, and I am not aware whether they concur with the London College of Physicians upon it.

THE FENIAN CONSPIRACY.—QUESTION.

MR. NEWDEGATE said, he wished to ask the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies, Whether he will lay upon the Table of the House certain documents, being a copy of leaves from O'Farrell's diary; a Report of some conversations between the Colonial Secretary and the late prisoner; several declarations in the nature of affidavits in support of the genuineness of the Papers; and an explanatory Minute by Mr. Parkes in his then capacity as Colonial Secretary, which documents had been presented to the Legislative Assembly of Australia, and had appeared in the Australian Newspapers? He said that information had reached him in reference to the Fenian conspiracy, such as rendered it in his opinion most important that the Government should lay upon the Table the documents to which his Question referred. These documents bore directly upon the existence of the conspiracy in this country, and showed clearly that a document had been sent out to Australia which was termed a warrant for the execution of the Duke of Edinburgh, and that it was sent out by some of the co-

incumbents, their estimate amounts to about £703,000. Sir, the Bill now before the House deprives the Protestant Episcopal Church of its property, and the Presbyterian and Roman Catholic Churches of their grants. It affirms without qualification voluntarism as the principle of your arrangements. Before considering the wisdom of this policy, I must express dissatisfaction with the way in which one part of the Bill has been introduced. I mean that relative to the preservation of life interests. I do not mean to assert that Her Majesty's Government, in so many words have said—"See how we have shown our generosity towards you in leaving you this;" but I wish to say that, in my opinion, there is a want of direct acknowledgment that in preserving those vested interests her Majesty's Government have done no more than a simple act of justice. I challenge any hon. Gentleman to adduce one sentence from any jurist or to supply a single statement from any historian or Statesman of authority relating to life interests such as those with which the Bill deals, and which does not speak of them as being as sacred and as inviolable as the fee-simple of any individual possessor. Sir James Mackintosh, a great jurist and a man of liberal and expanded mind, in discussing the propriety of the conduct of Henry VIII. with respect to the monasteries, and the way in which property of that description might be dealt with, said—"But it is an indispensable preliminary that life interests shall be protected and preserved sacred."—I mean, therefore, in the observations which I am about to make, to divest the question at issue of any considerations connected with the preservation of life interests as proposed by the Bill, for I cannot admit that the Government are entitled to claim the slightest acknowledgment from us on the score of generosity or liberality, because life interests are preserved. Sir, the principle involved in this Bill is the principle of voluntarism; the State is to have no control over, and allow no endowment from public sources to any Church; each must be self-governed and self-maintained. And the question to be answered is not merely whether the question of the Irish Church demands legislation, but whether you will introduce voluntarism as the guide of your ecclesiastical arrangements? True, the Bill is confined to Ireland, but will its principle be confined to Ireland? The right hon. Gentleman at the head of the Government asks the House to review our ecclesiastical Establishments in Ireland because the social position and endowments of the Established Church are the subject of jealousy to the sensitive pride of a majority of the Irish population. But if for that reason the ecclesiastical Establishments in Ireland are to be reviewed, how is Parliament hereafter to avoid taking the same course with regard to the ecclesiastical Establishments in Scotland and in this country? What is our position in Scotland? We have there an endowed Kirk, and beside it a Free Church nearly equal to it in point of numbers; and in addition we have the Dissenting Church of the Episcopalians, and the other Churches of the Presbyterians. I am not aware that a greater degree of contentment exists in the case of those Dissenting Churches in Scotland with respect to the endowment of the Kirk than prevails among the Roman Catholic and Dissenting bodies in Ireland in reference to the endowments of the Established Church. I will, in the next place, take the case of Wales. I have endeavoured to ascertain what are the statistics connected with the numbers of different religious denominations in that part of the kingdom, and I find that, beyond all question, Dissent there predominates. Lastly, I come to the endowed Church in England, which is, no doubt, the Church of the majority of the nation, but the minority of Nonconformists is very large in number and powerful in action—equally, it seems to me, if not even more hostile to the English Church than the Roman Catholics are to the Established Church in Ireland. A minority of this character, when it demands respect for conscientious scruples and religious equality, how are you to answer, if you concede these as your motives of action? If, therefore, for Ireland, in obedience to the demand of some 4,000,000 of people, we are to legislate, the sensitive feelings of Dissenters in Scotland and England may require that we should carry out the principle to its logical result, and that we should review our ecclesiastical arrangements in those countries also. Sir, it is the nature of a principle of action of universal application, when once adopted, to propagate itself and expand progressively. There is also a tendency in legislation to move in a path once entered upon. You will too, I think, find that there will be a disposition on the part of the people of Ireland, whom you are now despoiling of what they believe their rights, to endeavour to bring others into the same position in which they find themselves placed. I see indications of this already in Ulster. Do not then imagine that you can confine your views to Ireland. Everywhere this is a period of transition, and the future must depend upon the principles you now adopt, and in which your example will inevitably educate the public mind. Sir, at various times there have been various plans put forward in reference to the question at issue; but until the Resolutions of last year, never was the voluntary system suggested. In 1800 Mr. Pitt and Lord Castlereagh introduced into the Act of Union a declaration to the effect that the Protestant Episcopal Church of Ireland was to continue, and that it was to be one as regarded doctrine, discipline, and government with the Church of England. Mr. Pitt, however, proposed to accompany this Act with other measures. One was Roman Catholic emancipation, and the other was the endowment of the Catholic clergy and the elevation of their status. This policy of Mr. Pitt was again submitted to the notice of this House by Lord Francis Egerton in 1825, and being supported by a large number, including some of the most eminent Members of that day, the noble Lord induced the House, by a considerable majority, to declare that the State ought to make some contribution towards the maintenance of the religious teachers of the Roman Catholics in Ireland. In 1845 Sir Robert Peel again brought forward the subject in connection with the College of Maynooth, confirming, supporting, and with the weight of his great authority endeavouring to fix this policy on the mind of the public as the true policy to adopt. And not only was no measure in favour of voluntaryism introduced, but up to March last the voluntary system, as a means of maintaining the religion of Ireland, could not produce the name of any statesman as its supporter, except the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Board of Trade, or cite the name of a single great writer as its advocate. And when the right hon. Gentleman at the head of the Government comes forward and announces this novel policy we are led to inquire when he first gave his adhesion to it as the true mode of adjusting our ecclesiastical arrangements; and I find that in 1845 the right hon. Gentleman delivered a remarkable speech with reference to the Maynooth Grant, to which the right hon. Gentleman, in his Autobiography has referred back as the crisis of his political opinions and the exposition of the change in them. Now, having read that speech carefully, I think it points in the direction of the endowment of the Roman Catholic Church, and not of the voluntary system. If that is not so what did the right hon. Gentleman mean by telling the House—

“I do not say that this grant virtually decides upon the payment of the Roman Catholic priests in Ireland by the State; but I do not deny that it disposes of the religious objections to that measure. I mean that we who assent to this Bill shall, in my judgment, no longer be in a condition to plead religious objections to such a project.” —[3 Hansard, lxxix. 548.]

I have said that the voluntary system has no great name to support it but that of the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Board of Trade and those who have since followed him in upholding that policy. And I will now state another remarkable fact—not a single European nation has adopted it. Europe is at the head of the civilization of the world. It contains great varieties of Government, of religion; it contains Protestant States, Roman Catholic States, free States, despotic States; but in not one have you the voluntary system established or organized. Now, when a totally new line of policy is proposed for adoption, it is no immaterial fact to note that all the weight of statesmanlike authority and the practice of the most civilized Governments have been against it. Sir, the objections to the voluntary system have been repeated so often, both in this House and in the able treatises and pamphlets that have been published on the subject, that I shall sum them up very shortly. The voluntary system fails in providing permanence or universality of ministration, and tends to the deterioration of the quality of the instruction given. It fails to provide universality of instruction, because, as everyone knows, no one is the object of its care but those in whom it is pecuniarily interested; every teacher confining his attention to his own congregation, and leaving the mass of vice and irreligion which belongs to none, neglected and unnoticed. It fails in securing permanence because in periods of coldness and depression the voluntary system, which depends for its success upon the fervour of those who support it, becomes with them cold and apathetic, and inefficient. The more man needs, the less he seeks, the religious teacher. It fails in the quality of the instruction given because you make the teacher dependent on those whom he instructs; because you oblige him, in order to his own subsistence, to descend to their level rather than raise them to his. Able as the ministers whom it produces often are, very few of them are characterized by independence of spirit or elevation of thought. If the voluntary system is objectionable on these abstract grounds, it is peculiarly objectionable when you apply it to an old country. Every man is influenced by the circumstances of the country in which he is born, the system under which he lives, the character of the social life about him. The inhabitants of old countries are not brought up to meet the demands of ministers who give religious instruction in return for voluntary contributions. They have no organization for such a purpose; their habits are not trained to it, so that in an old country the natural difficulties inherent in the system are greatly increased by what has existed before, and the usages it has engendered. If, however, the system is objectionable in any country, I unhesitatingly say it is pre-eminently so in Ireland. What is the acknowledged tendency of the voluntary system? What do its advocates claim as a merit? That it increases religious fervour. Why, that is another way of saying that it magnifies theological differences, that it increases sectarian intensity, that it makes every sect an aggressor upon its neighbouring sect on the subject of religion. One of the greatest misfortunes of Ireland is the amount of theological controversy and strife that pervades it; and yet you are about, by the course you are now pursuing, to intensify that feeling. I agree with Archbishop Whately, when he said—"Introduce the voluntary system into Ireland and you will have two great camps with clerical sentinels pace to and fro between them, to keep any man from straying from one camp to the other." There is a second reason why the voluntary system is peculiarly unsuitable to Ireland. One of its calamities is irremediable: I refer to absenteeism. From that country is withdrawn the social influence of large numbers of great landed proprietors, and their large incomes are expended elsewhere. Good landlords these absentee proprietors are, and admirable managers of their own estates; but not coming into contact with distress and suffering, they are not so ready to give to objects of general benevolence. Now, the tithe rent-charge is an indirect tax upon these absentees, and a sort of compensation to the country, by providing a resident clergyman. You take that away. It will go to increase the wealth of the absentees. But as they do not require the religious instruction of the clergy of Ireland, and do not come into personal contact with them, I have no confidence in their providing voluntary equivalent contributions to the Church. Sir, we have been told in this debate of the success of the voluntary system in the colonies. But is it certain there is a perfectly voluntary system in any of our colonies successful? I will first take Canada, and there the Church at this moment possesses a very considerable endowment. She possesses it in two ways; first, the capitalization of the life estates of the clergy under the Canadian Act, from which the idea in the present Bill is borrowed, realized, owing to peculiar local circumstances, a considerable property, not for individuals but for the whole clergy. This property is now funded for the Church, and owing to the high local rate of interest produces a considerable income. The second reason why the Canadian Church is not altogether dependent on the voluntary system is a matter that is often overlooked. The Clergy Reserves Act is not the only Act in Canada dealing with the Church. An Act of George III. enables the Crown to empower the Governor to found rectories and endow them with land and property quite apart from the clergy reserves. These rectories, or the property belonging to them, were never taken from the Canadian Church. I have endeavoured to ascertain their number. I find from Lord Durham's Report that they then amounted to fifty-seven; how many were afterwards created I do not know. I believe that Canadian benefices of every description now amount to about 400. It is stated by Mr. Hatch, the head of the College of Quebec, in his able article on the Canadian Church, in Macmillan's Magazine for October, that the Church land at Montreal has turned out most valuable. Another circumstance occurred in Canada to enable this plan to be successfully carried out there. Previous to the passing of the measure there had been meetings for years in anticipation of the Bill. No man who had read Lord Durham's Report, which was published years before the Act was passed, could fail to see that the clergy reserves would be dealt with, and in anticipation of it synods and meetings were held in Canada, by means of which large voluntary subscriptions were raised and accumulated for the benefit of the Church. But no matter from what cause, the Canadian Church at the present time is not in the position to which you propose to reduce the Irish Church—namely, a Church dependent entirely and solely on the voluntary system. With regard to Australia, I find that in the colony of Victoria there is an Act regulating the Civil Service Fund, and that out of £150,000 annually provided for the civil list £50,000 is devoted to the purposes of religious worship. The Colonial Office, in May last, furnished a Return of the incomes of the several Bishops in all the colonies, and it appears that the Bishop of Melbourne receives £1,000 a year, from the Public Worship Fund, and that other Australian Bishops draw a salary from the same fund. Australia, therefore, cannot be quoted as an instance of a country having a system of entire and pure voluntaryism; and even if it were, from inquiry I have made of persons who know it well, I should not be disposed to hold that the state of religion and of religious ministers there is an example for our imitation. Now, I take the United States of America, which I admit does present an example of a perfectly voluntary system. But what is the state of religion there? I will ask any hon. Gentleman who has read Mr. Hepworth Dixon's account to answer that question. [Dissent.] If Mr. Dixon's authority be rejected—still I say I am not aware of any real authority upon which it can be asserted that the state of religion in the United States—its influence upon the thoughts and habits of the people, its power as an instrument of moral elevation—are such as to recommend the introduction of the voluntary system into this country. It will, no doubt, be said—"Why do you refer to these countries, when there is an example of a voluntary system at home? The Roman Catholic Church in Ireland is wholly maintained by voluntary contributions, without the slightest aid from public sources." Sir, I have lived so long in habits of intimacy with the Roman Catholics of my country, that I shall take the liberty, on this occasion, of speaking with perfect freedom on the question. No man who knows me will suppose that in what I am about to say I mean any disrespect either to the Roman Catholic religion or to its ministers. But there are some matters connected with that Church which are not satisfactory, originating, in my opinion, in its being a Church dependent on the voluntary system, and which, I think, might be changed with great advantage to the country as well as to that Church. Exemplary as are the Roman Catholic clergy in Ireland, and zealous in the discharge of their duties, they are taken from a class of society to which I consider the supply of religious instructors ought not to be confined. It is a much wiser principle which provides that the religious instructors of the people should represent every class of the community, and should be on intimate and equal terms with every class; a principle which brings, in the language of Burke, the "mitred prelate into the palace and the humble teacher into the cottage." Among the parochial clergy of Ireland there are few of birth, or station, or high education. In the monastic orders, indeed, I have known several men of high birth and station, and some possessing considerable property. Now, what is the reason of this? I go abroad, and take the case of North Germany. I find there, among the Roman Catholic clergy, many persons of family and education, and it is the same with the other Continental countries. Then how are we to account for the different state of things in Ireland? Sir, persons of refined culture shrink from a system which obliges the exaction of minute payments from humble persons. Everywhere, I believe, this feeling prevails.

[Second Reading—Second Night.]

I believe that in all Churches the class of persons entering the ministry will deteriorate the moment they are placed in a position which obliges a subserviency of thought, and often arts and practices, which an eminent French writer characterizes as a system of ecclesiastical mendicancy. Voluntaryism, then, is in itself objectionable, and its introduction menaces all your religious Establishments. And it is this consideration that, in my judgment, makes the question before the House of enormous magnitude, and the measure now proposed the most important that since the Union has been submitted to the Imperial Parliament. Sir, I believe that the glory and greatness of England is mainly due to the incorporation of religious influence with civil government, which is known as the union between Church and State. I will not occupy the time of the House with any examination into this subject, for it has been treated, and like everything he touched exhausted, by my great countryman, Burke. We have consecrated our civil government by allying it with religion, and by so doing, we have infused into the whole mind of the nation a sense of duty and trust—every act, whether of State or of private concern, under the influence of this principle, becoming hallowed, as it were, and invested with a higher and better sanction. I need not remind the House of that magnificent passage in which he likens the English Constitution to the Temple at Jerusalem—"at once a citadel and a shrine: the home of national freedom and the abode of national religion." And, Sir, the right hon. Gentleman at the head of the Government, in language not less glowing, has pictured this union in works that will long outlive the ephemeral breath of the mouth. But he is unable now to realize the vision of his youth. The utmost he can give the parting illusion is the homage of his respect; and therefore, restraining the rudeness of his Followers, he exclaimed in the debates of last Session—

"You do it wrong, being so majestic,
To offer it the show of violence."

Sir, if we are to have an alliance of the supreme governing authority with religion, it must be with the Protestant Episcopal Church; for both the Roman Catholic and Presbyterian Churches repudiate State control and government, and here let me say that the principle of the union of Church and State introduced into the Constitution is perfectly consistent with the most generous and enlarged sympathies with every other form of religion. No higher authority for this can be quoted than that of the great man whom I have already cited, who declared that the State of England ought to be in cordial intimacy with the three great religious denominations that exist in the three countries, but in subordination to the legal establishments. Sir, I now come to consider in detail the Bill. Objectionable as I have endeavoured to show it to be in principle, I must say that its character is not palliated or softened by a single wise or statesmanlike provision to modify or qualify it. Earl Russell has placed upon record that the change proposed to be accomplished by the head of the Government ought to be effected with care, forbearance, and solicitude. But how has the Bill been framed to fulfil that requirement? What is left to the Church, or what is done for her? I put aside the provision for life estates, because I have already quoted the words of Sir James Mackintosh to show that in this nothing is done but what rigid duty demands. Well, what has been given to the Establishment? The churches. Yes, and you will find by the authentic Report of the Ecclesiastical Commissioners that, within no great number of years, upwards of £600,000 of private money have been absorbed by those churches, irrespective of grants from the Commissioners, and irrespective of the restoration of St. Patrick's Cathedral, and if you add that, confessedly those churches are unmarketable for any purposes whatever, we can estimate what there is of bounty and beneficence in this gift to conciliate the feelings of the Protestant Episcopalians in Ireland. The glebe houses! How are they dealt with? I understood the Prime Minister last year to promise them. In a speech, characterized by great ability and enlarged views, which the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Board of Trade made at Birmingham, there is a declaration tending exactly in the same direction as that in which I understood the right hon. Gentleman at the head of the Government to go—namely, that, as an act of generosity, these houses with their curtilages were to be given. But how do you now proceed to deal with them? A house, as every one knows, lasts only a certain period, requiring to be perpetually renewed or re-built. What is the result? The charges on the glebe houses in Ireland are found on examination to be—on the bishops' houses, £32,594; on the dignitaries' houses, £600; on the glebe houses of the beneficed clergy, £198,781; the total charge being £232,335. The Government says—Pay that, and you shall have the houses. And what are we to pay that for? The Church Commissioners were unable to ascertain separately the value of the houses and curtilages, for this reason, that they were obliged to take the valuation in whatever form it existed in the Poor Law documents and receipts. Occasionally, the Poor Law Commissioners valued the house and garden; occasionally they valued the house, garden, and demesne; at other times, they valued the entire farm, the house and garden, altogether. We, therefore, could not separate them. Now, what is the entire value of all that is in the hands of the clergy in Ireland? I am not now speaking of the mere curtilages, but of everything—houses, curtilages, gardens, farms, which ecclesiastical persons hold. Sir, the Poor Law valuation of all is about £50,000 gross, from which, if we deduct the poor rate, the county cess, and other charges, it will leave a result of £32,000 a year. The right hon. Gentleman does not propose to give us this £32,000 a year for the £232,335. No such thing. He proposes merely to give us the house and what he terms the curtilage around it; and I have no doubt that what he proposes to give us for that sum could be bought in the market for the same amount. Where is the generosity in giving that for which you take an equivalent? I now come to the third matter which the right hon. Gentleman puts forward as an instance of the large spirit that characterizes this measure, and which the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary for Ireland dwelt upon with emphasis last night.—“We leave you,” say the Prime Minister and the Chief Secretary, “the private endowments.” See how generous that is. You remember that Henry VIII; founder as he was of the Reformation, did not do that? He made no distinction whatever between the endowments that came from private and those that came from public sources. “We,” say they, “not following in the footsteps of Henry, are willing to leave you the private endowments.” But how are they left? The most rigid legal test must be applied to prove them; they must be dealt with according to the strict rules of the Court of Chancery. And how do you further qualify, restrain, and abridge that gift? You refuse to include in it private endowments prior to 1660. What is the reason for the assignment of the date? I must say it is entirely a new discovery to me, and I may be supposed to have some knowledge on the subject of the relation of the Church of Ireland to the doctrine and discipline of the English Church; but to me it is entirely novel that the Church of Ireland first became in harmony and sympathy and union with the Church of England on the accession of Charles II. The right hon. Gentleman says, that previous to that time the Articles in Ireland differed from those in England. It is perfectly true that in 1615, in the reign of James I, Ussher, who was then Professor of Divinity in Dublin College, drew up Articles containing the doctrine of predestination more strongly and explicitly expressed than in the English Articles. Archbishop Ussher always asserted that those Articles did not differ from the English Articles; but that they stated the true doctrine of the English Church. In that he was wrong, because the English Articles were drawn with the design of embracing as well the opinions of Calvin and Augustine as of the opposite school of theology. But it is not true that you could not be a member of the Church of England and hold every Article that Ussher held. But what is the fact about those Articles, even historically? When Strafford came to Ireland, he opened a correspondence with Archbishop Laud about them. The result of that correspondence with Laud, whose views were directly opposed to those of Ussher, was, that Strafford objected to the Articles, and in 1634, mainly by the influence of Archbishop, then Bishop, Bramhall, a canon was passed, declaring that the Articles of the Church of England were the Articles of the Church of Ireland, and from that day to the Subscription Act, not the Thirty-nine Articles, but the canon of 1634 was subscribed by every person ordained to Irish Orders. Why is 1660 to be adopted as the date, whilst 1634, even if you proceed according to the result of this theological inquiry, is in point of history and of fact, the date of the adoption of the precise form of the English Articles? I would remind the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Gladstone) of one incident in literature, which he with his vast reading and knowledge must be acquainted with. That is, that when Jeremy Taylor came to preach the funeral sermon of Archbishop Bramhall, he said that from the date of that canon the Churches of England and Ireland were unius labii—of one heart and one mouth. But why enter on such an inquiry at all? Where will it lead us? By the 13 Elizabeth, as has been pointed out by the Dean of Westminster, what is provided in England? Clergymen not episcopally ordained were admitted to benefices in the English Church on subscribing, not the entire, but a portion of the Articles, and Presbyterians held benefices prior to the reign of Charles II., within the Church, and until the reign of Charles that practice was continued. Are you prepared to adopt the principle that the Church of England exists only from the reign of Charles II.? But, Sir, I am not disposed, no matter what the date you give, to allow that the gift of private endowments is anything demanding an acknowledgment on our part. There is not the slightest doubt that there are vast private endowments in Ireland, but how are they to be proved? Where are the deeds? There is no register of deeds in Ireland beyond the reign of Queen Anne, and the records of the Church registers have not been carefully preserved. How, then, are you to enter into an inquiry on this subject? You have no means but by the statements of contemporaries such as the sermon preached by Jeremy Taylor at Bramhall's funeral; and yet all claims to private endowments are to be put to the strictest legal proof. I endeavoured in the Church Commission to ascertain as far as I could what private endowments there were capable of being proved by deeds in Ireland, and what is the extent of them? In Table xxxiii. of the Appendix to the Church Commission Report, you will find the annual income from private endowments. It amounts to £6,330. These are recent endowments, under Acts of George IV., William IV., and Victoria. In

Table xxxiv. you will find the gifts of several Bishops stated; but with these exceptions we were unable to obtain legal proof—that is proof by deed—of private endowments. Therefore, if the rule is to be rigid, legal scrutiny, I controvert the estimate of the right hon. Gentleman when he says that £500,000 will remain to the Church. These endowments were given; they were not intended to be recalled, and there are no deeds of any kind beyond a given date, and the consequence is that in those prior to that date there can be no deeds of gift forthcoming. You hand them back again private endowments, most of them of recent date, guaranteed by the sanction of your own Acts of Parliament; you give those five or six gifts of Bishops, but what have you done for the institution? Absolutely nothing. Now I come to your conduct to the laity. I do not regard this Bill as dealing at all in a generous spirit with the laity. The landlords of Ireland are about to have placed upon them a very large tax—the indispensable necessity of meeting the demands of their Church and the support of their minister, and I say that such a change ought to have been accompanied by the greatest tenderness and bounty shown to that class. So far from being liberal, you are not even just. The landlord of Ireland, on paying the tithe rent-charge, is entitled to deduct from the clergyman the full poundage of the poor rate. I have ascertained the amount of this poundage for the year 1866, and out of £367,000, the gross amount of the tithe rent-charge paid in that year to the incumbents, how much do you think was deducted for poor rate? Why, £19,000. So that the landlords have been accustomed to have a proportion of about one-twentieth of the poor rate paid for them by the clergy. But when you come to deal with this matter in the Bill, you ignore this circumstance altogether, and you charge them upon the whole gross amount of rent-charge without the slightest deduction for poor rate. Now mark. If you were to attempt to sell this property in the open market to me or anyone else, I would buy it at so much less, and with a deduction of one-twentieth part of the price. Then, again, the arrangements for lending money and requiring the repayment of both principal and interest in the present generation is not advantageous under the circumstances. What would be the effect of that arrangement? You take the principle adopted by the Board of Works, which obliges the present generation to pay principal and interest for the benefit of a remote posterity. What do you do for the landlord? You throw upon him the whole burden of the Church, which must now be maintained by voluntary contributions. You throw upon him the burden of maintaining the glebe houses and lands, with a charge upon them of £232,000, and you burden him with the re-payment of both principal and interest in the present generation, for a benefit which will be first realized at the end of forty-five years. If a benefit was to be conferred upon the land, it would have been better to give it at once, and let the present landlords, who must found a new provision for their Church, receive the advantage. Sir, I now come to the capitalization scheme in the Bill, and I say it is a scheme that cannot succeed. The plan is that you ask the clergy to give up their Church livings for the capitalized value of their incomes. But you do not furnish the Church body with a pecuniary guarantee from the State—you do not give them an independent fund at the back of the capitalized value to make the security perfect—you calculate the exact mathematical value of the life income and by the rigid rules of an actuary or a notary. If your calculation is correct it will exactly exhaust the life interests of the clergy; if it should turn out to be incorrect—and let me tell you that the clergy are not remarkable for the brevity of their existence—if that should happen, the whole capitalized value would be gone, and the longest livers of the clergy would be left without the slightest fund to draw upon. The whole of this might have been obviated had you placed at the back of this fund a large and substantial sum by way of guarantee for the permanence of the interests and for the security of the institution in its financial engagements. Sir, I do not enter into the clauses relating to the constitution and self-government of the future Church further than to ask in what position do you place the Sovereign by this scheme? Observe, you do not repeal the Acts of Henry and Elizabeth, and the whole code asserting the Royal Supremacy. In the language of those Acts Her Majesty is and continues to be the Supreme Head on earth of the whole Church of Ireland; enjoys the title and has the whole state, honour, authority, and jurisdiction of that title. You retain the title but you take away the power. You proclaim, indeed, her authority, but you take her subjects away and “place a barren sceptre in her hand.” Yes; there is one power you do allow her—the power of recognizing and incorporating the new Church body, if you can come to an agreement with that body. That, and that, alone is preserved. There are also certain defects in the powers enabling persons to endow, but I will not go into these at length, because I understand that the right hon. Gentleman at the head of the Government, and the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary for Ireland, whose courtesy and fairness in addressing the House last night I desire, on the part of the Church, to acknowledge—I understand they invited suggestions in reference to these portions of the measure, and as these do not involve political questions and they relate to the organization of the Church, I think an agreement ought to be come to upon them. I may say, however, that I consider the present clauses defective, as they are not sufficiently enabling and affirmative. They do not adopt the language used in relation to the colonial Churches—they simply remove legal penalties for meeting in Synod. Sir, I now ask what will be the result of this Bill if it be carried upon the social and religious condition of Ireland? I desire to answer this question fairly, and I say I feel grave doubts whether the new Episcopal Church of Ireland will be successfully organized. I doubt, unless the provisions of the Bill be greatly altered, whether that Church will be adequately endowed. I also doubt whether the Presbyterian Church will be adequately endowed and sustained on the voluntary system, and for this reason—that as they are, with an income from the State, they have made repeated demands for increased assistance. I doubt whether the Royal College of Maynooth will be continued in the pecuniary position in which it ought to be. And why do I doubt that? The sum which the right hon. Gentleman estimates for Maynooth is about £400,000. The interest of that in the funds will be

£12,000. Up to 1845, the sum voted for Maynooth was £9,000. What was the condition of Maynooth in 1845? In that year Sir Robert Peel read a Petition signed by twenty-two Roman Catholic Bishops, containing the following statements:—first, that the professors were inadequately paid; second, that there was a debt on the College of £4,600; third, that they were obliged to send away their students for a considerable portion of the year, as they were unable to maintain them; fourth, that they were obliged to send out the students only half-educated, to enter on the work of the ministry; and, fifth, that there was an insufficient supply of clergymen for the Roman Catholic Church. You had then Maynooth fifty years in existence upon voluntary contributions, with £9,000 a year from Government. What will take place now under the voluntary system, with a greatly increased population, an increased demand for ministers, and a higher standard of education, and only £12,000 a year from public sources? You will have the same results, and these results will issue in general discontent. Why, you are at this moment obliged to admit that Maynooth is in debt, with her present endowment of £26,000 a year, and the Government is obliged to pay her liabilities to the Board of Works. I will go further. From all I hear, I believe that the standard of education at Maynooth requires to be improved and elevated, and that an increased not a diminished endowment is what the circumstances of that College demand. I say, therefore, that your scheme, your new policy, is a policy that will fail in the instance of every one of the religious bodies to which it is applied. I say it is singularly ungenerous to every system, and to every creed; and when I say this, I am reminded of a test which has been more than once suggested for philosophical principles. Do they breathe of what is elevating, of what is generous, of what is liberal, or are they restrictive, harsh, and severe? I propose this test to you as still more unerringly applicable to political measures; and I pronounce of this Bill — nil generosum, nil magnificum sapit—nothing is constructed, nothing is raised, nothing is benefited; all is proscribed, despoiled, and degraded. Sir, if this be so, if this be a true description of the measure, was not the right hon.

Dr. Ball

Gentleman the Member for Buckinghamshire (Mr. Disraeli) justified in asserting that the inevitable result of this policy must be general discontent? The clergy will be discontented because the sources of emolument have been taken from them. The laity will be discontented because new and additional burdens are imposed upon them. Increased religious differences will spread. Increased bitterness of feeling in respect of them will spread. I have read a little of theology, and there is one maxim that I have found in every theological writer, and that is an invincible determination to view the withdrawal of property once consecrated to religious purposes and its conversion to secular uses as utterly unjustifiable. I am not aware of an exception, from the day when Archbishop Whitgift told Queen Elizabeth that the recipients of ecclesiastical property were the eagles in the fable who carried home a prize with a burning coal within it that would consume their nests—down to Pope Pius IX., who has denounced the sacrilegious Governments of the Continent that have confiscated Church property. But are these views peculiar to ecclesiastics? Let any man examine the discussion of Sir James Mackintosh with respect to what took place in the time of Henry VIII. regarding the monasteries, and he will see how difficult it is to reconcile with the strict principles of justice the appropriation of Church property. Even Henry VIII. never confiscated without paying homage to this principle. In his Acts he recites that the monasteries voluntarily surrendered their houses and lands. This objection you too seek to mitigate in your Bill by giving the surplus to charities, a destination with somewhat of a religious character. Sir, I repeat that there will be universal discontent. For the moment the Roman Catholic clergy are appeased, because their rival is dethroned. And do you imagine that you can found permanent gratitude and friendship on such feelings? No; they will attribute the fall of the Establishment to your respect for Nonconformist opinion, and to your enmity to their Church, the secular destination of the property. Sir, the care of lunatics, the maintenance and reformation of juvenile thieves and misdoers, and the relief of persons afflicted with unavoidable suffering—all these are undoubtedly excellent objects, but there is one evil consequence that follows large endowments of this character not raised by taxation, and that is that the demand increases with the supply; and as we have now two great reformatories for male and four great reformatories for female juvenile offenders presided over by Roman Catholic ecclesiastics and religious bodies, I believe that these institutions will hereafter four-fold multiply, and increase. And so as to all your other charitable objects; while the landlords and occupiers of land will find that the great boon of the relaxation of the county cess means payment as it existed before, with supplemental aid for expanded demands. The county rates will remain as high and as oppressive as ever. Sir, I believe that a great shock is given to the feelings of the community in respect of property by this measure. The reverence for its sacred inviolability is rudely touched. I am aware of the distinctions between private property and property public in its sources and objects which have been drawn by Sir James Mackintosh, Earl Russell, and Hallam. Are you yourselves quite satisfied with those distinctions? But even if you are, neither Sir James Mackintosh, nor Earl Russell, nor Hallam, were ever consulted by the mass. It is idle to tell them of those theories. It is idle to say that corporations are different from individuals, or that the tenure is other than an individual tenure. These ingenious distinctions are too subtle—are immeasurably too subtle—for the Irish farmer or peasant. The plain facts suffice him—the Protestant Church acquired its property by the Act of Elizabeth, by the grants of James and Charles; the Protestant landlords acquired their property by the Acts of Settlement and the Patents of the same James and the same Charles. A breath has made both, and a breath can unmake both. The consequence will be that he will better the instruction given him, and fortified by the precedent set him, he will demand to be restored to those lands which he will believe to have been unjustly taken from him. Sir, it is for these reasons that I oppose this Bill; no message of peace and conciliation, no source of harmony and agreement among all classes, rather the fountain of discontent, of dissension, of general dissatisfaction, and a precedent for organic changes of even more dangerous consequence. But while I oppose it, I disclaim any want of sympathy with my Roman Catholic and Presbyterian brethren. I disclaim the slightest disrespect to their systems of religion. I believe the maintenance of an Established Church consistent with the most liberal appreciation of their claims. I derive assurance for that belief when I find it shared by every great Statesman of the past. Yes, ours is no new policy, born of the exigency of the moment. The marvellous wisdom of Burke, the presiding and commanding genius of Pitt, the vast political experience and sagacity of Peel, have alike sanctioned it. Supported by their authority, feeling confident that the principles by them transmitted are as just as they are expedient, we defend the institutions which they upheld, and refuse to abandon the most sacred and venerable of them all in the hour of its danger and its need.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. SULLIVAN) said, he could not but congratulate his learned Friend on the speech he had just addressed to the House. If the Church of Ireland had before wanted a defender, she had found one now in the person of his learned Friend the Member for the University of Dublin. But, remarkable as that speech was, it was as remarkable for what it did not say as for what it did say, and one of its most remarkable features was that the grounds taken by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Buckinghamshire (Mr. Disraeli) had been totally abandoned by his learned Friend. The property of the Church was defended by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Buckinghamshire on the ground that it was religious property vested in the Church as a corporation charged with a trust of an unequivocal and unalterable character; while his learned Friend who had last addressed the House had totally abandoned that ground, and rested his defence of that property upon this, that it was of the nature of private property, devoted originally to the maintenance of an Establishment that was necessary for the religion of the individual and for the exclusion of the voluntary system, the tendency of which was to degrade and lower. ["No, no!"] He said so most distinctly, because he had still the eloquent language of his learned Friend ringing in his ears—language in which he had described the lowering and depressing effects of the voluntary system, and the exalting character of the benefits which the Established Church would confer. And how did his learned Friend attempt to prove his case? He said that they would not find voluntaryism in any country in Europe, and was England, therefore, to adopt it? But if he (Mr. Sullivan) had learnt one thing from the history of England, it was that her proudest boast had been that she had not followed in the track of other nations; but that, when any portion of the country suffered from any system, whether theological or social, her aim was to establish equal justice and equal laws. Why was it that the Established Church in Ireland had been assailed in modern times? His learned Friend who had just spoken had said that until a recent period no Statesman of eminence, with the exception of one, had taken up the theory of destroying the Established Church and substituting a voluntary system. But had there been a man of education in Ireland—had there been many in England—whose attention had not been called during the last twenty-five years to the anomalous, extraordinary, and indefensible position of the Church Establishment in Ireland? And if the Church as established had failed what did the argument of his learned Friend amount to but this, that the property of the Protestant Church should be transferred to the Roman Catholic? Because if voluntaryism was not to be the system, if the Established Church of the minority had wretchedly failed, as it had been demonstrated a hundred times before to have done, what was the alternative left but the transfer of her power and her property to the Church of the great majority of the Irish people? But so far from the peasantry of Ireland regarding that Disestablishment Bill as a means of ultimately attacking the property of the landlords of Ireland, he had observed the attitude of calmness and self-denial they had assumed on that question. The Irish Roman Catholics repudiated the notion of sharing the property of the Established Church; and although the influence and the wealth of that Church had been used in maintaining a cruel domination over them for centuries, they now asked only to be put upon an equality with its members, and craved for no ascendancy. That ought to be an encouragement to every man in repelling the argument that that Bill would be but the commencement of a series of measures of spoliation directed against the land of Ireland. With the greatest possible respect he must say that was one of those wretched arguments which appealed simply to the prejudices of Gentlemen sitting behind his right hon. and learned Friend; and those who adopted that argument themselves paved the way for making the disestablishment of the Church, or any similar measure, a mode of aiding such subversive propositions if ever they should be brought forward. Then his right hon. and learned Friend said that voluntaryism was never known in Ireland. But did he not thus ignore his Roman Catholic fellow-countrymen, who had supported their religion by that system ever since its property had been taken from it and devoted to Protestant uses? His right hon. and learned Friend said that the Reformation really made no difference in substance in the possession of these endowments. Why, if there was one great historical truth clearer than another it was this,—that none of the Roman Catholic Bishops in Ireland, save perhaps one, adopted the Reformed creed, and that the Protestant religion was forced upon Ireland as a conquered country, against the will, the belief, and the conscience of the people. One of the ablest of modern historians, Mr. Froude, who had investigated the matter with the greatest care, speaking of the Government of Queen Elizabeth, used this language—

“Before the Government attempted to force religion upon the country, which had not a single honest advocate in the whole nation, there was no dishonesty. If she had left them their lands, if she had left them their creeds, they would have willingly acknowledged her supremacy. She could not bring herself to believe that in Ireland, where there were no Protestants, a different state of circumstances did not exist from what prevailed in England.”

Therefore his right hon. and learned Friend's argument, if worth anything, amounted to this,—that they must take that property away from the Protestant minority and transfer it to the Church of the Roman Catholic majority, who wisely and firmly rejected it. Then, it was urged that the grant to Maynooth and the Regium Donum were all to be viewed in the light of establishment. And here he might ask whence had come his right hon. and learned Friend's newborn zeal for the Maynooth Grant? Did his right hon. and learned Friend forget the body which he represented? Did he forget that as long as he had a small spark of Liberalism left in him, he was rejected by that University? It was not until he had recanted all his Liberal principles that constituency returned him. The representatives of Dublin University had always offered the strongest opposition not only to the Maynooth Grant, but to every measure for relieving the Roman Catholics from civil disabilities, galling oaths, and offensive declarations. And why, forsooth, did his right hon. and learned Friend now admit the Maynooth Grant was too small? Because he thought that Trinity College trembled for its own existence; and believed that by giving increased grants to Maynooth and to the Presbyterians the magnificent endowments of the Protestant University and the Protestant Established Church in Ireland would be rendered more secure. That reminded him of the Eastern warriors who were chained to their cannon in the day of battle. Sometimes they sought that position through fanatical zeal, which was not his right hon. and learned Friend's case; in other instances they were put there and compelled to do what they did not like. His right hon. and learned Friend had referred to the speeches of the First Minister of the Crown and of Sir Robert Peel upon the Maynooth Grant; but it might be asked had his right hon. and learned Friend read the speech made on the selfsame occasion by the right hon. Member for Buckinghamshire—a speech in remarkable contrast with the exalted notions as to the hallowed influence of the union of Church and State expressed by that right hon. Gentleman last evening. In the celebrated debate on the Maynooth Grant, to which reference had been made, the right hon. Gentleman opposite (Mr. Disraeli) said—

“I have unfaltering confidence in the stability of our Church; but I think that the real source of the danger which threatens it is its connection with the State, which places it under the control of a House of Commons which is not necessarily of its communion. Leave the Church to herself and she will shrink from no contest, however severe. I believe that in Ireland if the question is—‘Will you sever the Church from the State, or will you endow the Roman Catholic Church?’ for my own part I believe the Protestants of Ireland would say—‘Sever the connection.’”—[3 Hansard, lxxix., 560.]

“Under which King, Bezonian?” And that was the opinion then entertained by the Protestants of Ireland. They never would have consented to the endowment of the Roman Catholic clergy—they abhorred the notion of the endowment of Roman Catholicism as a State Church. And yet now, when the Established Church was in danger, they, for the first time, professed a liberality which they had never shown before, and as a bulwark to their own Church they were willing to place the Maynooth Grant and the Regium Donum on a better foundation. Now, he denied in toto that the effect of a disruption of the union of Church and State was to lower the character of a clergy. Having himself lived for many years in social intercourse with Roman Catholic priests, especially in the South of Ireland, he could say that, though not born of the aristocracy of the land, there were among them accomplished scholars and gentlemen, animated by an earnest zeal for their religion; and a more moral priesthood than the spiritual teachers of the Irish Catholics could not be found in Europe. The piety and religious fervour of their flocks, too, might be judged of by the manner in which their chapels were attended, alike at early morning and when the shades of evening fell. And how was all that brought about? Not by a clergy supported by rich endowments and ministering to the wearers of purple and fine linen; but by devoted pastors, maintained by the voluntary contributions of a humble peasantry. Well, what had been the result of the union of Church and State in Ireland? The right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Disraeli) told them that in England they had had 200 years of unbroken serenity, during which religious liberty had been asserted and enjoyed. But how were those 200 years spent in Ireland? The Irish statute book, which no right-minded man could read without burning shame, supplied the answer to the question. One of these statutes enacted that for every converted Popish priest in Ireland £20 a year should be levied on the county, like the grand jury or county rate; another offered a reward for the discovery of any one who was found practising the Popish worship. A Papist could not succeed to property, and the result of that system was that they had 600,000 and odd Protestants of the Establishment now in Ire-

land, side by side with about 5,000,000 of Roman Catholics. But what was the state of the relations between the Roman Catholics and the Established Church in that interval? In 1745 they found even the then Lord Lieutenant addressing the Irish Parliament in terms like these—

"The measures that have been hitherto taken to prevent the growth of Popery—which I hope have had, and will still have, greater effect—I leave to your consideration. I ask whether nothing, by new laws or by the more effectual execution of those in being, can be done to secure the nation against the great number of Papists, whose speculative errors would only deserve pity if their pernicious influence on civil society did not require the exercise of authority to restrain them?"

The 200 years of which the right hon. Gentleman opposite spoke certainly were 200 years of the very opposite of political serenity and religious liberty in Ireland, whatever might have been the case in England. It was towards the end of the reign of George III. that any hope was held out to the Irish Roman Catholics. It had been said more than once that no comparison could be drawn between the Irish Catholic priests and the clergy of the Establishment. But he would remind the House that the Catholic Church in Ireland, although a voluntary institution, had raised magnificent churches, supported noble charities, and maintained the priests. It was unfair to judge the clergy by an expression heedlessly used by some individual priest; but, taken as a whole, he believed that the priesthood of Ireland would compare favourably with any body of clergy in the world. He did not wish to speak disrespectfully of the Protestant clergy of Ireland, but was it a satisfactory state of things for twelve Bishops to enjoy an income of £50,000 a year, and many rectors £400 or £500 each, when their congregations could be numbered by units. Was it not cruel and barbarous that, by mere right of conquest, we should force the Protestant Establishment upon the Roman Catholic population of Ireland? One of the peculiarities of ancient Rome was that her victorious armies respected the religious feelings of the countries they invaded, and allowed the conquered to worship their own gods at their accustomed altars; but England had acted towards Ireland on a totally different principle. The dreadful policy of Elizabeth and William III. would not leave the Irish people their rights as free citizens unless they conformed to a religion in which they did not believe. On the passing of the Relief Act in 1829 the Catholics were, to a great extent, restored to the rights and liberties which their Protestant brethren enjoyed, but still certain offices were closed to them, as they could only be held by persons who made declarations to the effect that the worship of the Church of Rome was idolatrous and superstitious. Of course, however, the Catholic population felt themselves insulted by the retention of these needless and absurd declarations and oaths. The adoption of the principle of ascendancy had been the vice and ruin of the Establishment in Ireland. There could not possibly have been a more favourable time than the present for bringing forward this measure, and on this point what higher authority could he cite than that of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Buckinghamshire. In the year 1844 the right hon. Gentleman expressed the following opinion, which was none the worse because it was delivered so long ago. He said—

"He never believed that Ireland would be a great difficulty, because he felt certain that a Minister of great ability and of great power would, when he found himself at the head of a great majority, settle that question."—[3 Hansard, lxxii. 1010.]

And what was the right hon. Gentleman's notion of settling the difficulty? These were his words—

"Justice to Ireland was then said to mean an identity of institutions with England. He believed that to be the greatest fallacy that could be brought forward. He always thought that the greatest cause of misery in Ireland was the identity of institutions with England. Surely we had given them similar institutions more than enough. How could people ask for an identity of institutions when the most important institution of all—the union of Church and State—was opposed by the Irish people?"—[Ibid. 1011.]

And when the subject of municipal corporations was brought before the House the right hon. Gentleman said—

"Instead of the institutions of the two countries being identical, they ought to get rid of all English institutions in Ireland which had been forced upon the country. He ventured to lay it down as a principle that the Government of Ireland should be on a system the reverse of that adopted in England, and should be centralized. We should have a strong executive and an impartial administration."

And yet the right hon. Gentleman said last night that the Established Church in Ireland should be maintained because it was a local means of governing the country. The right hon. Gentleman advanced the argument that Ireland was destroyed by an absentee proprietary, and that the effect of the Bill would be to drive from the country a resident Protestant gentry. Well, no man who had travelled in Ireland, especially in the North-western counties, but must have noticed the great contrast between the mansion houses in which the Protestant clergy resided and the humble dwellings of the Roman Catholic clergy. Then on Sundays thousands of persons might be seen on the most lonely mountains and bogs going to worship in the Catholic churches, while two or three favoured persons assembled in the pews of the Established Church to hear the prayers read by a clergyman who received his £200 or £300 a year for performing that duty. All these things made the contrast a very striking one, and must surely have a very bad effect on the people. The right hon. and learned Gentleman opposite (Dr. Ball) was one of the four Irish Church Commissioners, who in their Report recommended that in parishes where there were fewer than forty Protestant inhabitants the benefices ought to be suspended or suppressed. Now, the results that would follow the carrying out of that recommendation would be very astounding. In the diocese of Lismore there were forty-two benefices at the present time, nine having been suppressed under the Church Temporalities Act; but if the recommendation of the Commissioners were carried out no fewer than twenty-one benefices out of the forty-two would be suspended. One benefice contained 11,260 acres, yet there were only ten Protestants. Another had 16,000 acres, with thirty-five Protestants; and a living near Cork with 18,900 acres, and yielding an income of £878 had thirty-five Protestants. The Commissioners, when they recommended that all benefices in which there were not forty Protestants in the parish should be given up, virtually gave up the whole case of the Irish Church Establishment. Why was it proposed to reduce the number of Bishops by four and the number of Archbishops, as had been recommended, by one, unless it was evident to every reasonable man that the Irish Church Establishment could not be maintained on any principle of justice? That Establishment had an opportunity in its recent history of regaining its position

when the great measure of national education had been passed for Ireland, and it was open to its ministers to co-operate with the Roman Catholic clergy in the instruction of the youth of that country. Of that opportunity it had not, however, availed itself, on the miserable pretext that the whole of the Bible was not permitted to be read in the national schools. Such was the course pursued by a Church endowed with large funds for the benefit of the community! She abandoned her position as an Established Church and afterwards complained that the national education had been placed entirely in the hands of the Roman Catholics. His right hon. and learned Friend the Member for the University of Dublin (Dr. Ball) complained that very little was done for the Irish Church by the present Bill; but he should bear in mind what was the scope and object of the measure. It was a measure not for the establishment but for the disestablishment of that Church. It was said that the measure treated the Church with great hardship in taking the epoch of 1660 rather than an earlier one, as that at which the validity of private endowment was to be respected. He affirmed that no man could put his hand upon any endowment of the Irish Church before 1660. If anybody could have done so his right hon. and learned Friend (Dr. Ball) would have done so. It was said that the Bill would take away some of the endowments that Archbishop Bramhall recovered for the Church; but he could not accept the view of the Irish Church before 1660 put before the House by his right hon. and learned Friend. The Roman Catholic Church made a tremendous struggle for property in the time of Charles I., and the state of the Irish Church before the Restoration was one of wild confusion. He must therefore contend that the year 1660 was an intelligible date on which to fix, and the more the matter was examined the more it would appear no wrong or injury was done to the Establishment in Ireland by taking that date. Again, his right hon. and learned Friend objected to the provision requiring that private endowments should be proved before the Court of Appeal in Chancery; but before what other tribunal, he should like to know, was that to be done? As to the objection that the Bill did not prescribe the mode in which the new constitution of the Church was to be brought about, he would merely observe that it was not for the State to suggest what steps the Church should take with that object. If the State were to lay down any rules on the subject, his right hon. and learned Friend might very well turn round on the Government and say that they were adopting a very tyrannical policy in not only disestablishing and disendowing the Church, but in dictating the course which it should, under those circumstances, pursue with reference to its own re-organization. If there was any one position in connection with the Bill which was capable of being more strongly maintained than another, it was that it left to the Church perfect freedom of action. The Government said—"We do not stand in need of your co-operation to accomplish the object which we have in view; but if you are ready to comply with the provisions of this measure, we will act with you;" and he could not but think that there were many wise and intelligent men among the clergy of the Irish Established Church who would not adopt the advice of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Buckinghamshire, and refuse the co-operation which they were invited to give, but who would make up their minds to meet the inevitable, and do their best, under the circumstances, by availing themselves of the facilities which would be placed at their disposal to promote the interests of the religion which they professed. But how were the clergy of the Established Church to co-operate with the State, asked the right hon. Gentleman? There were ten Bishops and two Archbishops with an income equal to £50,000 a year at least, besides an army of rectors enjoying incomes of £700 or £800 a year, and having little or nothing to do. How, he should like to know, could they employ their time better than in re-organizing the Church. Could they not employ a few hours a day for a few months in so useful a work? For his own part, he believed the clergy of the Established Church loved their faith too well, and were too deeply impressed with the truth of their religion, to refuse to accept the mission which lay before them in vieing with their Roman Catholic brethren and with each other in the endeavour to spread education in Ireland, and to imprint a religious tone on the minds of the youth of that country. It had been,

he might add, urged in opposition to the Bill by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Buckinghamshire that it would give all the property of the Church to the landlords in Ireland. Now, he denied that the landlords were bribed to acquiesce in the Bill; they had only been dealt with in respect of the tithe rent-charge upon fair and reasonable terms. But the right hon. Gentleman's objection had been answered by his right hon. and learned Friend the Member for the University of Dublin, who said that the Bill would give the landlords nothing at all. The fact was that the property of the State was not vested in the Church as a corporation; there was no such thing as a Church corporation. The Church consisted of an aggregate of corporations for the more easy holding and transmission of property which, having been granted for the maintenance of a State religion, might, without injustice, be resumed by the State through its Parliament whenever the public welfare demanded the adoption of that course. To contend that funds of that description were private property was a misuse of the term, and he denied that the Bill interfered in the slightest degree with the foundations of private property. He would repeat that the hour was most auspicious for the passing of the measure. The appeal to the verdict of the country, which the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Buckinghamshire had over and over again in the course of last Session announced it to be his intention to make, had been fairly accepted and completely answered. It now only remained for the House to send forth a message of peace to a people who never refused to respond to acts of justice and good-will. By destroying Protestant ascendancy they would confer an immense boon on Ireland, and one that would be duly appreciated. An hon. Member had said, he could not understand what was meant by Protestant ascendancy. He (the Attorney General for Ireland) answered—Let them but come from their lordly homes in the North to the South, and see the contrast which was presented, and then let them tell him whether they did not understand Protestant ascendancy. In his heart he believed this measure would ultimately tend to the advantage of the Irish Church itself. It would be received with gratitude, and they might rest assured that it would not be followed by any extravagant ideas as to its effect on private property.

SIR FREDERICK W. HEYGATE said, he wished to assure the House that the Irish landlords still adhered to their opinion that this was an unjust measure; and they were not at all tempted by the bait which was held out to them. It was said that the country had arrived at a verdict upon the subject; but this had not been arrived at after a careful inquiry into the matter, but simply for the purpose of obtaining a political result. He wished to examine the question not in reference to its bearing upon one political party or the other, but in reference to its bearing upon the happiness and prosperity of the country. What struck him in reading the Bill was that it was not a Bill to provide for religious equality, but rather an elaborate scheme for the re-construction of the Irish Church, and it seemed to him that after some years they would arrive at very much the same point from which they had set out. It appeared to him also that all the advantages that it was supposed that the Bill would give might just as well have been attained by the proposition of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Buckinghamshire last year that there should be a severe reform of the Irish Church. It was in vain to expect that this measure would give satisfaction to any class in Ireland. Bishop Moriarty, in a remarkable letter to The Times, protested against the Church of Ireland being allowed to hold as a corporation any property whatever; and the Presbyterians also were not satisfied. At a meeting of Presbyterians last week, the speakers one and all said that the Government, if they carried the measure in its present form, could not expect to have the support even of the Liberal Presbyterians; and unless it were amended then, as far as the Presbyterian claims were concerned, it could not be regarded as a final settlement. At another meeting of the same kind in Belfast it was stated that the proposal of the right hon. Gentleman would, instead of £75 a year for each minister, give them only £36, whilst the claims of theological students were entirely overlooked, and it was added that this was a pretty return for the services of the Presbyterians in co-operating with the Ultramontane party for the support of the present Government. Those utterances showed what might be expected hereafter. He would go a long way in approving any plan, though it might even be harsh in its application to individuals, if it promised good results to the community. But how would this measure work? It was said that the property of the Church originally belonged to the Roman Catholics; and, therefore, that it was a burning shame that it should remain in the hands of Protestants. One injustice, however, should not be cured by committing another, and the laity ought to be considered as well as the clergy. But while the Government proposed to compensate ministers for their life interests, their flocks were quite forgotten. Another reason given for the Bill was that the Church was a failure; but surely it could not be considered as a failure in every part of the country. In Ulster the Church congregations averaged about 540 persons in number, whilst the pay of each clergyman very little exceeded £300 a year, and this being so why should so sweeping a measure be applied to the whole Church of Ireland? The attention of the House had already been called to the fact that the chief property of the Church in Ulster had never been the property of the Roman Catholic Church, and it was an undoubted fact that that property had been forfeited by the repeated rebellions of the great chiefs, and had then been given to the Church. The Chief Secretary for Ireland objected to the Church of Ireland being considered in the light of a colonial Church; but he (Sir Frederick Heygate) contended that, in almost every point of view, the plantation of Ulster was nothing more nor less than a colonial Church, and that the Scotchmen and Englishmen had peopled it under circumstances entitling them to the continuance of their Churches. Hon. Members would, he thought, be impressed with the fallacy in the Ministerial scheme which treated the clergy as though they alone represented the Church. It was true that the clergy ought to be compensated fully for the loss they were about to sustain; but where was the compensation to the rest of the Church? Every member of the laity really had as much right to compensation as the clergy, whereas their only compensation was that the clergy were expected to sacrifice part of their incomes in order to form a fund for the future endowment of the Church. Under the new arrangement which would be necessary if the Bill passed, the Protestant Church would often be found in the wrong place; now, the church was in the centre of the parish, but, in the future, when they were left to the voluntary system, the church must be in that part of the parish where the great bulk of the Protestants lived; so that in many instances there would be the expense of building new churches in parishes where churches already existed. The glebe houses would not, in many cases, be so useful as might be supposed; they would be too large, for the voluntary system would never produce men of the same class as the present ministers. A most elaborate scheme was framed in reference to the tithe rent-charge; but he defied the Government to show how a system of religious equality would arise out of it. If they were to have religious equality, it should be thorough and complete. He believed that a great proportion of the Irish landlords would refuse to touch the tithe rent-charge even with the tips of their fingers, or would take it only with the intention of re-endowing the Church with her own property. Canada had been very much appealed to as affording an example of the success of the voluntary system; but, in the last year's Report of the Society for the Propagation of the Gospel, it was shown by several clergymen connected with churches in the Province of Quebec, that the Church of England there was struggling for existence, and that, if the aid of the Society were withdrawn, mission after mission would have to be closed. It appeared, however, that in Canada there were a great many endowments. Many of the clergy there had commuted their revenues for certain sums of money. He had enquired how it was that clergymen were able to recover from the Church Body the exact incomes they gave up. He found that such results were occasioned by the fact of the high rate of interest in Canada—that interest being sometimes no less than 20 per cent. The value of land also was constantly rising. Now the reverse of this was the case in Ireland. Even if the voluntary principle were as successful in Canada as had been represented by an hon. Member in that House, the circumstances connected with its working in that country were entirely inapplicable to Ireland. One part of the right hon. Gentleman's proposal he heartily approved of, and that was the arrangement which enabled the clergy of the Roman Catholic and Presbyterian Churches or their congregations to borrow money from the Government, to be repaid by instalments spread over several years, for the building of suitable residences and glebe houses. He (Sir Frederick Heygate) had made a similar proposition some years ago. He thought that all clergymen were entitled to good residences. What was really wanted in Ireland was social equality, and all the religious equality they could establish would not of itself secure that object. It was not funds derived from Church property which had enabled clergymen of the Established Church to take socially a higher position, but it was because they sprung from classes possessing more property and education. In the application of the surplus the right hon. Gentleman seemed to have looked high and low to find a class with no religion in Ireland; for he had bound himself to the principle that the money should not be applied for the furtherance of any religious purposes. At last it appeared that he had selected lunatics and idiots, who were the only objects in Ireland supposed to be of no religion. With regard to the other classes enumerated, the difficulty had not been avoided, for in the North of Ireland most serious discussions had taken place with reference to the appointment of a chaplain to a deaf and dumb asylum, and the institution was nearly given up because the patrons could not agree upon that point. With regard, however, to the lunatics, he (Sir Frederick Heygate) would remind the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary for Ireland that in 1867 the number of lunatics in Ireland was 15,600, whereas the hospital accommodation was only equal to 5,200 of them, and those were maintained at a cost of £149,000. If, then, this part of the proposal of the right hon. Gentleman were carried out, there should be provided accommodation for three times the number they housed at present, and of course the cost of their maintenance would be increased to about £450,000. This amount would be required for lunatics alone, and he believed the right hon. Gentleman would have at his disposal only £209,000. [Mr. GLADSTONE: That is not my figure.] He had no doubt the figure would be found very near the mark, if it was not quite accurate. Then again, the particular treatment to be given to incurable lunatics, as distinguished from curable patients, was a subject calculated to raise many difficulties in the way of the right hon. Gentleman when the time came for giving effect to his plan. The percentage of incurable lunatics was between 80 or 90, whereas that of curable lunatics was 13 or 14. The question was at present assuming a great importance in England. In Belgium they had actually some villages appropriated to the reception of incurable lunatics, and the placing all lunatics in asylums was a wrong principle. It appeared to him, that the proposition of the right hon. Gentleman involved a great waste of public money, and that it was going in the wrong direction. He would say that the maintenance of the poor and the care of lunatics should always be a first charge on property. As far as the cesspayers were concerned, he believed that, instead of this proposal resulting in a saving of the county cess, it would have the very opposite effect. During the seventeen or eighteen years he had been connected with Ireland, he had noticed that there had been a series of delusions constantly practised; and once more the right hon. Gentleman had damaged the interests of the Irish people by teaching them to look for material improvement, not to their own industry and habits of order, but to the legislative changes which the right hon. Gentleman intended to effect. After the great famine, the idea of emigration was proclaimed. Well, a great many thousand people did then emigrate, and the House knew the opinion that was generally entertained of the effects of such a system. The next panacea was the creation of large farms; and landlords were induced to expend vast sums of money in furnishing their small tenants with the means of emigrating, in order that they might extend their farms, so as to enable the occupiers to maintain themselves and their families better than they could do by the cultivation of small portions of land. Well, what was the result of this arrangement? Why, that there was no language too bad to apply to such landlords. Next came the Incumbered Estates Court remedy, by which the people of Ireland were told that all the embarrassed landlords would be sold out, that the lands would be let at moderate rents, and would be better cultivated. It now appeared that the effects of such a measure were quite the reverse. Well, last year they had the Fenian craze. That was followed by the proposed purchase of the Irish railways by the Government as a panacea. And last of all, they were to be deluded with this measure of so-called religious equality. The great thing wanted in Ireland was peace and quietness; and all that was proposed to be obtained by the present sweeping measure might be procured by a measure for the reform of the Irish Church. Had a moderate and comprehensive measure of Church Reform been brought forward, real advantages might have been gained; but if this Bill passed—and he hoped it would not—the public mind, familiarized with all these changes and results, finding the advantages held out had not been secured, that property had become more unsettled than ever, that life was not a bit more secure, that discontent was more prevalent when the people of Ireland found themselves no better for the change, re-action would set in, and even the right hon. Gentleman himself would wish he had never proposed this measure. On the grounds he had stated, he believed the measure would be most prejudicial and unjust; and he should do all in his power to prevent its passing. If he stood alone—which he was very sure he would not do—he should certainly divide against the second reading. He would, in conclusion, say one more word as to what was called religious equality. Religious equality never would be attained in Ireland. The attempt was made in 1640 and failed, and it would fail again. In 1683, Dr. Peter Heylin, Sub-dean of Westminster, quaintly wrote—

“A learned prelate of this land,
Thinking to make religion stand
With equal poise on either side,
A mixture of them both he tried.
An ounce of Protestant he singleth,
And then a dram of Papist mingleth,
With a scruple of a Puritan,
And boyled them in his brain-pan;
But when he thought it would digest,
The scruple troubled all the rest.”

As with doctrine, so with the members of different religions, each would strive for the mastery, and religious equality be as far off as ever.

SIR JOHN GRAY: The speech just delivered by the hon. Member for Londonderry (Sir Frederick W. Heygate) affords another illustration of the remarkable fact that all the speeches made from the Opposition Benches during this debate seem to have been intended for the discussion in Committee, and not for the discussion on the second reading. He would not follow the hon. and right hon. Gentlemen in that course; but would ask the House at this stage not to depart from the real issue then before them. That issue was plain and unmistakable. It was not whether establishment or disestablishment was right or wrong in the abstract—it was not whether endowment or disendowment was right or wrong in theory—these issues, important and suggestive as they were, did not constitute the issue raised on the second reading of the Bill. The real issue was—How is the Queen's Government to be carried on in Ireland? To that issue the House should direct its attention—and on that issue they should pronounce. Is Ireland to be governed as heretofore as a conquered country, or is a course of wise and beneficent legislation to be adopted, which will cause her people to feel that they are to be placed on the same platform of equality with the people of England and of Scotland, and to be ruled on the same principles of equity and justice? The Bill then before them asserted the principle that Ireland ought to be dealt with as an integral portion of the Empire—and that, and not minor details, was the subject on which they had to decide when they said "Aye" or "No" to the second reading. He (Sir John Gray) should admit that he listened with great admiration and much pleasure to the eloquent display made by the right hon. Gentleman the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Disraeli), but in proportion to his admiration of his oratorical skill was his disappointment at his omission to define a policy for his party. The pleasure which he experienced was still more diminished by the bold assertion of the right hon. Gentleman—that the Established Church in Ireland held up the standard of toleration, and had been the bulwark of religious liberty in that country. It was to be deeply regretted that the right hon. Gentleman had not consulted his "historical conscience" before making that assertion. Had he done so, his "historical conscience" would, no doubt, have informed him that the history of the Established Church in Ireland, from the first hour of its existence to the present day, did not furnish one fact—did not even afford the shadow of an excuse—for the assertion that that Establishment ever sustained the cause of toleration, or that its mission was other than to suppress rather than to advance religious liberty in that country. He (Sir John Gray) would venture to say that the "historical conscience" of the Empire would declare that the whole career of that Establishment was adverse to religious liberty and freedom of conscience. He would, in proof of this opinion, go back to the first century after the introduction of the Reformation in Ireland. During that dark and gloomy period the progress of the Established Church was marked by the burning down of churches, the hanging of the priests of the people, by transportations and confiscations, and by the almost never ceasing presence of civil war, of bloodshed and of anarchy, the result of the means adopted to establish that Church. It might be said from the opposite Benches that that century was essentially one of strife and cruelty, and he would, therefore, pass from it and come down to that period which certain Gentlemen opposite delighted to describe as the "glorious and pious" epoch at which William III. was placed on the Throne, and from which the admirers of the Revolution of 1688 profess to date the establishment of peace, order, and civilization, and the security of religious liberty. He would confidently appeal from the "historical conscience" of the right hon. Gentleman who moved the Amendment last night to the "historical conscience" of the House, and ask did the firm planting of the Established Church in Ireland at that period promote toleration in that country, or secure the religious liberties of the people? The last great struggle of the Irish race was made round the walls of Limerick, and ended not in defeat, but in the conclusion of a treaty ratified by William, which guaranteed religious liberty to the Irish Catholics. They all knew the result. The Catholic regiments laid down their arms—a few of the soldiers took service under the revolutionary King, but the majority, in accordance with the treaty, entered the service of foreign Princes, and departed from their native land feeling confident that by the Treaty of Limerick they had secured that for which they struggled—religious freedom and the security of property. What, however, was the result? Hardly had the Catholics laid down their arms, and hardly had the brave men who fought so fearlessly set sail till the treaty was repudiated by the supporters of the Established Church; and instead of that toleration, that religious liberty, and that protection of property which was guaranteed to the Irish Catholics by the treaty, a series of Penal Laws was enacted against the Irish people, the most cruel and oppressive, which has no parallel in the history of the world. The property of the Catholics was confiscated—their priests were banished—no Catholic was allowed to carry arms—to hold any office in the State—a Catholic was not permitted to be a barrister—to be an attorney—to be a doctor—to enter any of the learned professions; he could not hold a lease of land for more than thirty-one years—he was not permitted to be apprenticed to a trade—he was shut out from the guilds—he could not even become a shoemaker, or tailor, or a barber—he was denied the right to be educated—to him it was only permitted to live and be a serf in his own land. This was the standard of toleration raised in Ireland by the Established Church—this was the religious liberty which, according to the “historical conscience” of the right hon. Gentleman opposite, was maintained by that Church! These laws were as immoral as they were cruel. By these the Conforming son was taught to rob his father, the wife was encouraged to acquire separate property by repudiating her allegiance to her husband, children were seized and made proselytes in infancy; and these laws were enacted by an Established Church House of Commons, elected by Protestant electors, and passed by an Established Church House of Peers, the working majority of which almost invariably consisted of Prelates of that Church, which we were told last night held up the “standard of toleration,” and preached the Gospel of peace on earth and good-will to all mankind. He was unwilling to trespass on the attention of the House at any length on so important an occasion as the present when so many Members who had greater claims were anxious to take a part in the debate. He could not, however, refrain from congratulating the House and the Empire on the advance made on this question since he (Sir John Gray) brought it before the late Parliament in the year 1866 at the request of a conference of his brethren in the Irish representation. Many Members in the present Parliament were Members of that Parliament also, and would remember that he found some difficulty in getting a day fixed for the discussion. It was postponed from time to time, and he was indebted to the kindness of the right hon. Gentleman at the head of the present Government for the assistance given him at that period, to which he mainly owed the opportunity he got for bringing forward his Motion. But though he obtained a full discussion he was not able to bring the question to a division, owing to the general apathy that prevailed, because of the then absence of all hope of any practical result. That is not quite three years since. He (Sir John Gray) was not, however, even then without hope—he had confidence in the justice of the cause and in the justice of the English people. In the succeeding year—1867—he found less difficulty in obtaining a day for the discussion, and they had the additional advantage of a division, and in a full House his Motion was defeated by Lord Derby’s Government by only a majority of 12. That division was, to his apprehension, conclusive as to the advance of opinion, and he felt that the hour of justice had so nearly arrived that the question must pass from the hands of a non-official Member and be transferred from below the Gangway to the leading Benches. In that opinion his Irish brethren concurred. The question did pass not only from below the Gangway to the leading Benches but to the front Bench, and not only to the front Bench but to the hands of the Prime Minister—and he might say, even in his presence, to the hands of the leading Statesman of the day—the man whom the world would recognize hereafter as the great Statesman who gave peace and prosperity to Ireland, and strength and liberty to the Empire by the just and wise Irish policy he was originating—a policy that would identify his name with the first great effort during three centuries of English rule, to extend religious justice to the Irish people. In three years the question had advanced not only to the Ministerial Bench, but had reached the Throne, and obtained the gracious sanction and approval of the Queen. ["No, no!"] What! Have Gentlemen opposite not read the gracious Speech of their Queen, in which she recommends this House and the other House of Parliament to adopt such wise and prudent legislation, with regard to the religious interest of Ireland, as would give peace and contentment to all her subjects in that kingdom? I repeat then, with emphasis, that this question has advanced to the Throne, and that not only the Parliament and the Cabinet, but the Sovereign and the people of these realms are of one accord on the great question raised by the Bill before us, and determined to do full though tardy justice on that subject to the Irish nation. Having thus briefly alluded to the rapid advance made in public opinion, he would ask the further indulgence of the House, and with permission offer a few observations on some of the topics embodied in the speech of the right hon. Gentleman who moved the Amendment against the policy of just government in Ireland. The right hon. Gentleman in the course of his eloquent address last night said that it was an historical fact that whatever change was made in the Church in Ireland, that whenever and by whomsoever a change was made, it invariably resulted in the transfer of some of the property of the Church to the pockets of the Irish landlords. In that his (Sir John Gray's) "historical conscience" quite coincided with the "historical conscience" of the Leader of the Opposition; and as the right hon. Gentleman omitted to supply proofs of his statement, he (Sir John Gray) would ask permission to supplement that statement by official proofs of its accuracy. On this subject he (Sir John Gray) was an enthusiastic supporter of the opinions of the right hon. Gentleman, that the Irish landlords pocketed the plunder of that very Church, as defenders of which their representatives appeared there that night, and he made a few extracts from the Returns of Lord Derby's Church Commission of 1867, in order to demonstrate that the right hon. Gentleman did not exaggerate the facts when he said that the Irish

Sir John Gray

Protestant landlords were the great spoliators of the Church, and appropriated to themselves the plunder of that institution which they professed to revere. He would not trouble the House with many illustrations of the truth of that assertion, which, however consoling, as a matter of fact, was not a very complimentary statement for their Leader to make as to the purity of the motives of the Irish Church defenders. Beginning with Ulster, the first case he would cite was that of a distinguished Duke, the late Viceroy in Ireland, who, as President of the Church Defence Association of Ulster, would be admitted to have a claim to precedence. That noble Duke was reported by the Royal Commissioners—of whom the right hon. Gentleman the Member for the University of Dublin (Dr. Ball) was one of the most distinguished and able—to be possessed of 5,736 acres of the episcopal lands of Derry, and of other lands of the same character, the extent of which was not given. These lands were in the immediate vicinity of the noble mansion of Baronscourt—than which there is not a more princely residence in Ireland—and may be said in fact to be demesne lands. For that vast territory he pays the Church an annual rent of £69 12s. 1½d., and a fine of £678 11s. 9d., making a total annual payment of £748 3s. 10½d., or about 2s. 7d. per acre. Adjoining Baronscourt is situate the prosperous town of Newtown Stewart, around which are clustered the ruined churches and castles of the O'Neils—sad memorials of a Royal house, and historic monuments of the fate of the ruin and confiscation for conscience' sake that befell a conquered but a chivalrous race. On turning to the records of the adjoining diocese of Kilmore he found, according to the same Return, that a Mr. Jones, the descendant of a Welshman of that name, who had to be imported to perform episcopal functions in Ireland—the native Bishops having refused to have any identification with the State Church—enjoyed 5,938 acres of the episcopal lands of which his episcopal progenitor had the fiduciary charge, and for this princely territory this son of the Church pays only £725 15s. 10d. annually, including rent and fines—or about 2s. 5d. per acre. In the same diocese there were many aristocratic descendants of another episcopal family—the Beresfords—whose ancestor came to Ireland, and settled in Coleraine in 1614 as the bailiff of the London traders, when James I. resolved to plant Ulster with Protestants imported to occupy the lands and churches from which the Catholics were expelled. One member of that episcopal family is reported by the Commissioners to hold in perpetuity 3,731 acres 2 roods 9 perches of the see lands of Kilmore, and another member of the family—the Most Rev. Father in God, Marcus Jervis Beresford, now Lord Primate of Ireland, holds also in perpetuity 3,777 acres 3 roods and 36 perches of the ancient see lands of Kilmore, for which they pay the Church the nominal rent respectively of £826 13s. 6d., and £765 6s. 3d., or equal to 4s. 1d. per acre per annum. They heard a great deal last night from the right hon. Gentleman the Leader of the Opposition about the fiduciary character imposed on Church property. His speech on that branch of the subject was quite learned and instructive, and, no doubt, a person who could speak so eloquently on the nature of trusts will highly appreciate the fiduciary care manifested by this episcopal family in their dealings with the see lands over which they, from time to time, presided. Possibly the fiduciary Bishops thought the best mode of discharging the trusts committed to them would be the establishing the members of their own families as magnates in the land, by conferring on them the property of the Established Church. In addition to the two cases referred to he referred to some of the Beresford Bishops, who carried out the fiduciary duties confided to them by establishing for another member of their family—the Marquess of Waterford, President of the Church Defence Association of Munster—a right to 1,532 acres of the lands attached to the see of Kilmore. In the see of Armagh the same system prevails. One of the Maxwells—also a descendant of an episcopal family, whose ancestor was imported from Scotland to be “planted” as a Protestant on the lands of the Catholics who were expelled for not conforming, and who rose by means of the Church to wealth and dignity, and eventually founded the Earldom of Farnham, holds 2,133 acres at £256 10s. yearly, about 2s. 5d. per acre. In Meath diocese the Balfours, also an ecclesiastical family, hold 8,273 acres at £387 13s. 10d., or about 11d. per acre, and Meath contains some of the richest land in Ireland. In Dublin the same alienation to scions of episcopal families prevailed, and one of that lucky class, Mr. Cobbe, a gentleman of great political activity, and a great friend of the Church, holds 7,050 acres of the see lands of Dublin in perpetuity for £233 7s. 10d. per annum, or less than 8d. per acre. The last illustration he would trouble the House with was taken from the archdiocese of Cashel, one of the descendants of the Archbishop of Cashel, who came as a clerical adventurer to Ireland, attracted, no doubt, by the good tidings of the good things that were to be obtained there, and eventually reached the mitre and grasped an Earldom—the Earl of Normanton—holds 8,510 acres of the best lands in Ireland at 4s. 4d. per acre. The lands are well known to many Members of this House, they adjoin the property of Lord Derby, and form part of a tract so rich and fertile that it is called the Golden Vale of Ireland, and which would on an average bring £2 an acre. He might multiply similarly gross instances of see lands alienated to members of episcopal families and others at rents so purely nominal that the lands might as well have been confiscated by the Bishops for the benefit of their descendants—a course which, on reflection, ought not to have been so severely censured by the right hon. Gentleman, for it, in fact, seemed to be the most effective application of the property for the establishment of the Church. Looking then to the see lands, and the manner in which they were parcelled out by the Bishops to enrich their families and connections and friends, he would confidently ask who were the spoliators of the Church—were they the men who sought to apply the property for the benefit of the whole people, or were they not rather the men who appropriated it to their own families, and the men who continued to enjoy the spoil while pretending in this House and elsewhere to be the only friends of the Church? He for one flung back the term spoliation to the Benches from which it issued, and denounced the men who continued to hold the rich and fruitful lands of the Church as family perquisites as the true spoliators of that institution. But the episcopal lands did not contribute the only property of the Church which was spoliated by the Protestant landlords of Ireland. The right hon. Gentleman, to whose elaborate speech he had so often referred, stated that since the year 1834 the Irish landlords had pocketed more than £3,000,000 of the tithe rent-charge which ought to have been paid to the Church. He (Sir John Gray) regretted that the right hon. Gentleman was not a little more precise in his figures, for, according to his calculation, the sum so pocketed amounted more nearly to £4,250,000—money-spoil taken from the Church, and pocketed by the Irish landlord friends of the Church. This sum constituted, however, but a fraction of the sum total of which those friends of the Church despoiled it. The agitation of the Irish landlords to abolish the title of agistment, and thus free their grass lands and demesnes from tithes, while still leaving the burden on their agricultural tenants, almost created a clerical rebellion in Ireland quite as serious as that with which the Church defence agitators now threaten the State. The Irish landlords in both Houses of the Irish Parliament were, however, resolved—they carried their point, and to this day the clergy and Bishops in their essays on the Church question complain of that spoliation. The hon. and rev. Henry O'Brien, brother to Lord Inchiquin, a respected minister of the Established Church, in a remarkable pamphlet which has just issued from his pen, says—

“The tithes were commuted for a tenth of their value, and, to secure that tenth, 25 per cent had to be given to the landlords as the only agents able to collect them from the indignant native occupiers of the soil.”

He did not think the rev. gentleman exaggerated very much, for on referring to the last available Returns of the value of crops in Ireland, he found corroboration of the estimate. The House must remember that tithes meant the tenth part of the produce, and that any adjustment as to the commutation was assumed to represent that tenth, and the tenth sheep, the tenth sack of potatoes, the tenth lamb, the tenth egg were wont to be exacted in Ireland; and if the Church had a right to the tithes it had a right to the full tenth of the whole produce. He found from the last Returns that the value of the agricultural crops in Ireland in 1867, exclusive of pasturage, was £30,000,000, and he found by the Returns of the

Royal Commissioners that the amount of rent-charge paid to the Church in lieu of the tenth of the produce was under £370,000. The difference then between £3,000,000 annually and the £370,000 was merged in the landlords' rent, and represented the amount of which the Irish landlords despoiled the Church—their loved, cherished Church—under that one head of spoliation. Who, then, he would repeat, were the spoliators of the Church? Were they not—in the words of the right hon. Gentleman the Leader of the Opposition—the Irish landlords? The right hon. Gentleman stated with great dogmatism that the plan of capitalization provided for in the 23rd clause of the Bill would be of no benefit to the Church, and that even if all the incumbents commuted their life interests there would be no balance left at the period when all the annuitants would have passed away. He regretted to observe that on that evening the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Dublin University (Dr. Ball) endorsed that statement of his Chief, and even added that there might be an actual money-loss but that there could be no gain. He (Sir John Gray) had taken some trouble to investigate this matter, and made some careful calculations to ascertain the probable working of the capitalization, and arrived at the conclusion that, by proper management, there would result a balance that would give nearly one-third of the present income of the Endowed Church as the income available for the Disendowed Church at the termination of the annuities secured by the Bill. Not content with his own calculations, he showed his result to an eminent authority on such subjects, who confirmed it. But if the right hon. Gentleman should prove right in his estimate, it is in the power of the Irish landlords, by disgorging a little of the Church spoil which their Leader says they put into their own pockets, to make up the difference, and thus prove the sincerity of their professions of attachment to their cherished institution. The present net income from public sources of the incumbents is reported by the Church Commissioners at £481,436 2s. 3d. The Primate and other ecclesiastical writers report it as less than £400,000; but taking it at the highest figure it will be apparent that a very little restitution of the plunder of Church property by

Irish landlords, of which their Leader so justly complains, would render the Church altogether independent of the voluntary offerings of the poorer members. The capital sums contemplated by the Act, as stated by the Rev. Alfred Lee and circulated by the Church Institution, is £5,700,000. This £5,700,000 might easily be vested in lands or on good Protestant mortgages at $4\frac{1}{2}$ per cent, which would produce £256,500 a year. If the Protestant landlords who have pocketed, as the right hon. Gentleman says, so much of the money of the Church since 1834, would re-pay the Church as interest on that sum even 4 per cent, it would bring the annual income of the disendowed Church to more than £400,000 a year, assuming that the calculation is right, that eight-ninths of the landed property of Ireland is owned by Protestants. Every man acquainted with the management of land in Ireland knows that the usual percentage for agency fees is 5 per cent as a maximum. That covers all fees for sub-agents, bailiffs, drivers, &c.; and surely if a Protestant landlord can collect his own rack-rents for 5 per cent he ought not to have charged his beloved Church 25 per cent for collecting the stipend. But he would not even ask the Protestant landlord to disgorge the whole of the 25 per cent. He would allow him as much as any other tithe-proctor was allowed; and even allowing the 5 per cent for collecting, there is at present merged in the land, and received by the landlord as rent, a clear 20 per cent of the property which belonged to the Church—part of that spoil of which the Leader of the Opposition spoke, and that being property actually paid to the landlords as rent, and retained by them as the usurious tithe-proctor's fee, they ought in all honesty, and no doubt judging by their professed desire to sustain the Church they will feel bound to pay it over henceforth to that institution which is the life and light of the nation. Eight-tenths of that, the Protestant landlords' portion of the spoil, would be about £88,000 a year, which, added to the sums already named, would place the Church in nearly the same position financially that she now enjoys. He did not ask the friends of the Church to disgorge the whole of the spoil they had pocketed, or any of it. He only asked them to pay a small interest on the spoil of the last thirty-five years, and for the future not to rob the Church by the usurious demand of 25 per cent as tithe-proctors' fees when they could get the work done for less than 5 per cent. By this suggestion he would test the sincerity of the Irish Protestant landlords, and the Church would test the reality of their pretended devotion to its interests and its financial prosperity. He hoped they would hear no more of spoliation from the Opposition Benches until the Irish landlords on those Benches shall have announced their determination to disgorge at least the small portion he indicated of the spoil and plunder they have exacted from the Irish Church. He did not set much value on the capitalization plan. He would not like to see any, even a seeming remnant of the injustice remaining, no matter how the fund might be accumulated and preserved; but at the same time he felt that the question before them was removed far above the narrow question of pounds, shillings, and pence, and would cheerfully accept the Bill as it stood—as a Bill that aimed at the accomplishment of fair and righteous legislation for Ireland, and would for the sake of that great end, and to secure the entire unity of action, give up any special opinions of his own to secure the success of the great measure before them. It was said on the previous night by the hon. Gentleman the Member for South-west Lancashire (Mr. Cross) that the Fenians had made no allusion to the Church question in any of their proclamations, and that it was not therefore one of the grievances of which they complained. It was known to every Irish Member in this House—and he would tell hon. Gentlemen opposite—that the Fenians, with whom they seemed to have some secret alliance, were persons who ignored the authority of that House, of the House of Lords, and of the Throne, and who consequently would never come there as petitioners. He disagreed with the Fenians; the Gentlemen opposite might support them, and cherish them, and stimulate them, but he would not. He told them that the Fenians would seek no redress from them—their policy was to repudiate all Parliamentary action, and refer only to the arbitrament of the sword. He was ever anxious to dissuade his countrymen from the folly of such a mad and wicked policy. He told them again and again, and ever would tell them, that it was as foolish as it was wrong and immoral, and he warned Gentlemen opposite that the course they were taking on the great question of religious equality was the true pabulum of discontent and disaffection in Ireland. They were by that course confirming the people in their adhesion to the doctrines of those who told them not to appeal to Parliament for redress, but to look to their own right arms. The policy of those who supported the Bill was on the other hand the only policy that would stifle discontent by giving the hope and the reality of justice. He supported that policy because it would unite the two peoples and the two kingdoms—it would teach the Irish people to look to Parliament for the redress of wrongs, and persuade them that, though centuries of misgovernment had well nigh crushed out the energies of the people, the Crown had at length become their friend and the law their protection. That policy, if steadily acted on, would rally the Irish people round the Throne, the Constitution, and the law; it would paralyze Fenianism, and put an end to its proclamations.

VISCOUNT CRICHTON: Under ordinary circumstances I should not venture to obtrude myself upon the House of which I have so lately become a Member. But living as I do in the North of Ireland, and representing a northern constituency, I do not feel it consistent with my duty to give a silent vote, but as far as it is in my power to give expression to the sentiments and the feelings of those among whom I have lived, and the constituents I have the honour to represent. I bespeak, therefore, that indulgence which the House generally has accorded to those who laboured under the disadvantage of addressing them for the first time. I feel that disadvantage the more as the subject has been so thoroughly handled, and the ground so fully occupied by the debates of last year, and in the course of the appeal which has since been made to the country, so that there is little that is fresh to advance on the subject. I agree with the hon. Member for Kilkenny (Sir John Gray) in thinking that we ought now to discuss the principle of the measure, and not go into details which might more properly be left for Committee. I have listened with deep attention to the statement of the right hon. Gentleman who introduced the measure which is now under discussion (Mr. Gladstone), and also to the speeches of hon. Members who have spoken in defence of the measure, and I have carefully studied the details of the Bill itself, but I have failed to discover either in their arguments or in the provisions of the Bill anything tending to lessen the aversion which I have always entertained with regard to the projected spoliation of the revenues of the Established Church in Ireland, and the disconnection of religion from the State in that part of the United Kingdom. And, Sir, although nothing could be more lucid or admirable than the exposition of the right hon. Gentleman when introducing the Bill for the first time, still, however, there are a few points upon which I think the House is entitled to some further explanation at the hands of Her Majesty's Government; and in the first place I presume we may infer, although I did not quite clearly understand it to be so, that the Bishops and incumbents are, for the rest of their life, or for the time that they continue to fulfil the duties of their office, to be left in possession not only of the fabric of the glebe houses, but also of such portions of the glebe lands surrounding the houses as they hold in their own hands, what are called in Ireland the "demesnes." Now, these demesnes have, for the most part, been entirely created by former incumbents, who may be said to have invested their money in their creation on the understanding that they were to remain for ever in the possession and for the uses of the Church; this investment may be looked upon in the light of private endowment and, according to the principles laid down in the case of the benefactions of Primate Boulter and Robinson, ought to be respected. But we are told that upon the lapse of the present incumbencies, the New Governing Body is to be allowed to purchase only ten acres round the glebe houses—the fabrics themselves being thrown into the bargain, solely on account of their utter worthlessness to anybody else. I think, therefore, the House has a right to be informed if any or what deductions from the price of these ten acres is to be made on account of improvements, and also what arrangements are to be made in the case of demesnes exceeding ten acres. Again, Sir, there is the commutation of the Regium Donum, and the grant to Maynooth. I have always understood that these monies have been paid out of the Imperial Exchequer, the Consolidated Fund, or something of that sort; and although I had not the advantage of being in the House last year when the Resolutions were passed, I heard that the right hon. Gentleman then declared that on no account would he, or those with whom he was acting, think of bestowing any of the confiscated revenues of the Church upon the members of any other denomination; yet, in spite of their declarations, in spite of the announcement that, in the measure now proposed, no deviation from the principles laid down last year will be found, we hear that the commutation of the incomes of the Presbyterian clergy and the Maynooth Professors, amounting to £1,100,000, is to be provided for out of the disposable funds of the confiscated Church property, and that the Imperial Exchequer is to be to that amount relieved from Irish burdens—thus obliterating those letters of iron in which it is written that the money is to be applied to Irish purposes. Well, Sir, private endowments are to be respected, but with this limitation—that they must date from the year of the Restoration of Charles II., 1660. But why fix the date at 1660 instead of 1634? Even on the principles laid down by the right hon. Gentleman, private endowments should date from this year; for in a Convocation then held the Thirty-nine Articles were unanimously received and adopted though, probably out of respect to Archbishop Ussher, at whose instance the Lambeth Articles were adopted in 1615; the latter were never formally repealed. Now, I presume there is a diversity of opinion as to what was the exact date of the commencement of the Reformation in Ireland. Some will maintain that it dates from the time of the rejection of the Papal supremacy in the reign of Henry VIII., I believe in the year 1536—two years later than in England; others will date it from the substitution, under Edward VI., of the English Liturgy for the Latin Mass in 1551; while, perhaps, a third party, taking into account the changes and disturbances in the succeeding reign, will not admit that a final settlement took place till the accession of Elizabeth, when, in a Parliament in Dublin, in I think the year 1560—a Parliament attended by three Archbishops and seventeen Bishops, the Reformation was accepted with only two dissentient voices, and subsequently ecclesiastically ratified in a Synod convened by the Lord Deputy a few months later. However, taking the very latest of those points of time, there still remains a period of 106 years—a period, too, of very considerable zeal and earnestness, during which we know for certain that many private valuable endowments were bestowed on the Reformed Church. Well, Sir, I admit that the troubled state of that period would perhaps make it difficult now to trace the source of some of those endowments; but when we consider that a very considerable portion of them, between £30,000 and £40,000 a year were regained for the Church through the instrumentality of Primate Bramhall, then Bishop of Derry, and with the co-operation of Charles I., Lord Strafford, and Archbishop Laud, who, I think, will hardly be accused of Calvinistic or Puritanical tendencies, I think the House will see that as to this portion of them, at all events, there can be no uncertainty whether it was intended for Episcopal or Presbyterian purposes, and that its devotion to the erection of lunatic asylums would be a distinct violation of the principle of respecting private endowments. I shall say no more on this subject, but pass on to notice what I conceive would be the unjust operation of the measure against poor curates in Ireland. In illustration of this view I will mention one instance which has come under my own observation in the town which I have the honour to represent. It is that of a poor curate who, thirty years ago, was in his father's office, but having changed his views in life had taken Holy Orders. From that day to this he had been in the receipt of £70 a year from the Church fund. He had lately had besides an additional income of £60 a year as garrison chaplain, but that source of income was fluctuating, and might cease at any time. That worthy man had a wife, and, like most Irish curates, several children. Under the present Bill, the hopes of advancing himself in life with which he had entered the clerical profession would be put an end to, and he would be condemned for the rest of his life to his miserable £70 a year. Now, Sir, as regards the principle of the measure itself, I wish, in the first place, to express my satisfaction that the "levelling up"

scheme, as it was termed last Session, is not to be revived; for much as I deprecate the proposed measure, I should view with still more distrust and dislike any scheme for propping up existing institutions by the co-endowment of another, and, as I believe, alien and hostile creed; and in the second place — for I suppose it behoves us now-a-days to be thankful for small mercies—that we are not to be subjected to the pains of a lingering death but, by the favour and excessive benevolence of our executioners, a short, sharp and speedy termination is to be put to our sufferings. But, Sir, I fear that these two topics exhaust all the gratitude which I am capable of entertaining towards the right hon. Gentlemen who form Her Majesty's Government, for I confess that I am utterly unable to appreciate their assurances that the result of this measure will be favourable to the advancement of religion, to the interests of Protestantism, and to the stability of the property, the laws and the institutions of the country. I suppose the object of disestablishment is to remove a sentimental and of disendowment is to remove a practical grievance; but, if I mistake not very much, one of the very first effects of the measure will be to add another practical grievance to those which are already supposed to exist. There is a very wide spread, and, indeed, a very natural, idea among the peasantry who cannot be expected to enter into or comprehend all the subtleties and intricacies of the question, that when the Church is done away with, and the parsons, as they imagine they will be, are sent about their business, that they will no longer be called upon to contribute their quota to the tithe commutation rent-charge, and that accordingly there will be a corresponding diminution in their rent; when, therefore, they come to the office on the next rent day and are told that they are not to get any diminution, but are for the future to pay for the support of lunatics, and deaf, dumb and blind, instead of the clergyman who resides amongst them and spends his money in indiscriminate charity and employment of labour, they will very naturally think that they have been sold; and not being disposed to believe that they themselves will ever come under the category of those classes intended to be relieved, will consider an almost imperceptible diminution of county cess a very inadequate return for what they had been led to expect. Well, Sir, I believe that will be one of the first effects of the measure upon the class it is intended to benefit; but what will be its effect upon the class that it is intended to despoil? What will be its effect upon the scattered families of poor Protestants in the South and West of Ireland whose ancestors settled there on the faith of pledges that they and their descendants should have the ministrations of the Gospel according to the doctrines of the Reformed Religion maintained for them, when they, few in numbers, possessing little wealth, and not backed up by resident gentry to help them with their purse and their influence, are deprived of the ministrations now within their reach? How will they maintain a clergyman to baptize their children, to train them in the paths of knowledge and virtue, and in their dying hour to minister the consolations of religion? Sir, for an answer we have not to look back to history, we have but to refer to what happened in the beginning of the 18th century—an age of spiritual deadness, when, in consequence of the bad provision for the spiritual wants of the Protestants in the more uncivilized parts of the country, many of the meaner people, as Archbishop King relates, and among them the descendants of Cromwell's soldiers, were daily going off to Popery. History, we are told, never fails to repeat itself, and this I say will be the effect of the measure, and those who have initiated it will have to bear the responsibility, and I do not envy them the burden, that the light of the Reformation will be extinguished in many parts of Ireland. Sir, I believe this to be essentially a poor man's question — not a rich man's. I believe the Church in Ireland—as indeed the Church everywhere, notwithstanding all that has been said to the contrary—to be the Church of the poor and not of the rich. I hold that to be the essence of an Establishment, as opposed to the voluntary system, that its ministrations should be provided free of expense to those who are not able to contribute themselves towards the support of the minister and the maintenance of the Churches. I shall not, therefore, enter into those arguments by which it has been argued, and I hold successfully argued, that this measure will be de-destructive of the rights of property. I shall not weary the House by endeavouring to prove that St. Patrick was a Protestant, or that the Bishops of the Irish Church deduce their succession in uninterrupted descent from him, while the Roman Catholic Bishops are intruders, deriving their orders from Rome and Spain. I will not enumerate the legislative enactments by which her property was granted and settled upon her, and the collateral securities by which they were guaranteed when changes affecting her status and integrity were accomplished. All these matters have been so debated and thrashed out both during the last Session of Parliament and in the interval when the appeal was being made to the country, that it would require one with more eloquence than I possess to lay them before the House in a shape which would command its forbearance and attention. But, Sir, I hope the House will bear with me a little while longer while I endeavour to state, as briefly as I can, my views as to the reasons which are usually assigned by those who advocate a change unprecedented and almost without parallel in the history of our country. I believe the main argument briefly stated is this—that the Church as a corporate body, or I believe to speak correctly, an aggregate of corporations, having been connected with and endowed by the State, with certain property for a certain purpose, and having failed in that purpose, it is competent for the State to dissolve that connection and to resume those endowments. I am not enough of a lawyer to go into the difference between the rights of corporations and the rights of individuals, but as far as regards tithes, which make up the chief part of her property, I do not think any date can be assigned for the period when the State can be said to have endowed the Church with them. I believe that tithes have been Church property existing from the earliest times, and though unknown to the Irish Church at the Council of Cashel in the reign of Henry II., cannot be said to have been then granted for the first time, but were rather an assertion of the Church's right, believed to be of divine origin, which the State lent its active jurisdiction to enforce; but I do not admit that the sole or even the primary purpose or mission of the Irish Church is to convert the Roman Catholics. I believe the first test of her efficiency is the manner in which she has kept in her fold and ministered to the spiritual wants of those committed to her charge; and however much in times past from causes, over which she at least had no control, her ministers may have neglected their duties, even those who are now seeking her destruction are compelled to bear testimony to the piety and devotedness of her clergy, the zeal and liberality of her laity, and the great increase in the number of churches, of curates and of congregations that has taken place during the lifetime of the present generation—and if I am told that she has failed altogether as a missionary Church, I can point to the operations of the different Church Missionary Societies, especially in Connaught, whereby during the last thirty years the number of churches has been increased from seven to thirty; of congregations, from thirteen to fifty-seven; of clergy, from eleven to thirty-five; and of the Church population, notwithstanding emigration, 2,326 souls; while by the instrumentality of the West Connaught Church Endowment Society, during the last nine years nearly £25,000 have been collected, and nine districts have been provided with churches, schools, and a permanent endowment for a clergyman. But, Sir, admitting that she has not made as much progress in missionary work as might have been desired or hoped for since the period of the Reformation, what, I ask, is the main reason and cause? Because she has been used by the English Government and the English Parliament as a political engine; and because Ireland has from the earliest times been made the battle-field for contending parties; and I must here ask the indulgence of the House while I enumerate the causes which have operated to hinder her efficiency, for I think that when an English Parliament is asked to assent to a measure like the present, it is but fair that it should clearly understand that the causes assigned for this measure are causes having their origin in the action of Parliament itself. The selections of her Bishops and superior clergy were made more with the view of advancing English rule and English power than for the promotion of the spiritual welfare and instruction of the people—the very fact of the Reformation originating in England was sufficient of itself to arouse the hostility of the Irish, and this hostility to the English race rather than to the religion—a hostility having its origin in days when the Church itself was Roman Catholic, is demonstrated by the fact that in the Irish language there is even to this day no word for Protestant—Sassenach or Saxon is the only equivalent for it. Such was the dread of the Irish language, or the desire of extinguishing it, that the Act of Uniformity (2nd Elizabeth), provided that if an Irish priest were ignorant of the English language, he might perform the Church Service in Latin; and yet, notwithstanding this, it is well known that the Latin Edition of the Prayer Book was never circulated in Ireland, and consequently the service used in those parts of Ireland where the clergy were ignorant of English, must have been the old Roman service. Spenser describes the kind of men who were sent over to Ireland to fill the highest offices of the Church in graphic language. Again, the condition of the country, rent by civil war, which was fomented by the intrigues of the Popes and their emissaries, prevented the spread of religion; and after the plantation of Ulster in the reign of James I. had given some hopes of a new era of peace and progress, thirty years' cessation from internal discord had enabled the Church to make some progress in establishing religion and order, the frightful massacres of 1641, directed chiefly against the members of her Communion—for it is a curious fact that the rebels were ordered to spare the Scotch Presbyterians in the North—diminished her numbers, and the subsequent accession to power of Cromwell, whose perhaps necessary retaliation and cruelties had increased the hostility of the natives to England and to the Reformation, instead of bringing redress or consolation to the afflicted Church, only increased her troubles; for the Republican Government which had overturned the monarchy and the Church in England, was not likely to deal more leniently with the Church in Ireland, but suppressed her Liturgy, imprisoned her Bishops and clergy, and sequestered the revenues of her benefices and sees. If we take into account the further troubles in the reign of James II., I think it will be admitted that she never had anything like approaching to a fair chance till the time of William III.; but even then the causes which before operated to impair her efficiency were still in existence. Everybody will remember Dean Swift's humorous description of the Englishmen who came over to fill the Irish benefices in his time—namely, that they were the highwaymen who had robbed the true and reverend missionaries on Hounslow Heath on their journey to Ireland, and personating their victims, came with the vestments and credentials robbed by them, and procured admission to the Irish livings. The Penal Laws, enacted professedly in the interests of the Church, in reality increased the aversion of the Roman Catholics towards her, and deepened the mutual animosities of party and creed. Then, again, the selfish policy of the landlords prevented the increase of the Protestant population by preferring Roman Catholic tenants, who, being accustomed to a lower scale of living, were prepared to offer, though not always to pay, any amount of rent which might be demanded, and consequently to outbid the former, who, being unable to live by farming, emigrated in large numbers; indeed till the famine time, emigration was almost exclusively confined to Protestants. And it was not only by these external operations that the Church was affected and her usefulness impaired. Successive legislative enactments stripped her of her property and diminished her revenues. Again, by the selfish policy of a Parliament of Protestant landlords, the clergy were deprived of the tithe of agistment; the Church Temporalities Act suspended ten bishoprics, and out of their incomes and a tax laid upon those of the remainder, vestry cess hitherto levied as a Church rate was supplied, and her already maimed revenues were further diminished by the operation of the tithe commutation rent-charge, whereby at one swoop a fourth of the tithes still remaining were handed over to the landlords. When, therefore, you consider that at the time of the Revolution the Church population of Ireland was 100,000 to 800,000 Roman Catholics, or one in eight; and at the last Census it was 700,000 to 4,500,000, or one to six-and-a-half; and when you consider that this actual and relative increase in her numbers has taken place spite of all the obstacles to which I have referred, the wonder is not that she has failed to convert all Ireland to the Protestant faith, but that she exists at all; and the injustice of the measure by which it is proposed to take from the clergy who have extorted by their conduct, even from their enemies, unqualified praise and approbation, property which was without questioning freely bestowed on men confessedly unworthy of it two centuries ago, and which, had it come down un-mutilated and in its entirety, would have been worth £250,000 a year more now, the injustice, I say, of this measure becomes more and more apparent. The only other point with reference to which I must ask leave to make a few observations is the argument directed against, what may perhaps be called, the sentimental part of the grievance,—namely, Establishment, when it is asserted that the Church is the symbol of ascendancy, and that the Bishops and clergy of the Church of the majority of the people are insulted and aggrieved by the spectacle of the ministers of a smaller body in connection and communion with the State, and in the enjoyment of whatever advantages and dignity may be supposed to be derived from such a connection. Now I am afraid that this feeling, though ennobled with the name of a sentimental grievance, partakes more closely of the nature of a more sordid and less dignified emotion—namely envy, and more particularly of envy as defined by Dr. Johnson “Pain felt and malignity conceived at the sight of excellence and happiness.” But after all, what is this ascendancy—it is not the existence of Penal Laws, for every vestige of them have long been swept off the statute book; it is not the exclusion of Roman Catholics from the high offices of State, for one of that persuasion now fills the post of Lord Chancellor of Ireland, the highest office to which a subject can be called; and out of the twelve puisne Judges, eight are Roman Catholics, a great disproportion when we consider the relative numbers of the two creeds at the bar. In what then does it consist? In this simple fact, or rather in the assertion of this simple fact, the ascendancy of the Queen in her own kingdom over a foreign Potentate, a Potentate who would not allow the subjects of that Queen to build even one church in his own capital. Nor is this ascendancy, this supremacy a thing of recent date, although finally established by Henry VIII. It has been asserted by English monarchs from the earliest times, and from the days of William the Conqueror the right of the Crown to create bishoprics was jealously guarded as one of the highest prerogatives of our Sovereigns. This prerogative was more jealously asserted in Roman Catholic days than afterwards, for when in the time of Henry II. Cardinal Vivian was sent as legate to Scotland, Ireland and Norway, on his arrival in England the King sent the Bishops of Ely and Winchester to ask him on whose authority he grew so hardy as to come into his kingdom without his leave, and he was not permitted to travel throughout England without giving his oath that he would not exercise his commission without the King's leave. In this supremacy of the Queen then lies the sole vestige of ascendancy that is to be found in the Constitution of the country; under it the Bishops and clergy of the alien religion,—for I assert that the Roman Catholic is the alien religion as opposed to the national—enjoy a greater degree of liberty than is accorded perhaps in any part of the world. They are permitted unlimited freedom of worship, of speech, and of action; and, unhappily, in many instances, they ill requite this forbearance by indulging in inflammatory and seditious harangues and by undue interference with the freedom of elections to an extent which if practised in Roman Catholic France or Austria, would speedily gain for them an introduction to the police authorities of those countries. And when this supremacy of the Queen is abolished, as it will be when you have accomplished the disestablishment of the Church, think not that it will be long before another is substituted. The machinery is even now ready. You have a Cardinal Prince of the Holy Roman Empire—who, I fear, is beginning to lead by the nose certain distinguished personages on the other side of the Channel,—at the head of a powerful hierarchy and a highly organized parochial system permeating the length and breadth of the land, ready to step in and fill the void you are inviting us to make, and the result will be the substitution of the supremacy of the Pope for the mild and beneficent rule of our gracious Sovereign. Sir, I believe that ascendancy, that Protestant ascendancy consists in that which Parliament never had the power to give, and which no Parliament ever will have the power to take away. I believe it consists in those qualities of energy, self-reliance, frugality and industry, which have turned the comparatively unfertile soil of Ulster from a wilderness into a garden and has peopled its cities with a thriving and industrious population. Sir, I believe these habits have been fostered and matured by the teaching of a Church, which while, on the one hand it asserts the free and unfettered exercise of the right of private judgment and of the interpretation of the Holy Scriptures, on the other by providing an independent provision for its ministers, prevents them from deferring their better judgment to the prejudices, and too often the caprices of their congregations upon whom they would otherwise be dependent for their support. Sir, I rejoice to think that the Legislature—though in the plenitude of its power it may strip her of her possessions, may lower the social status of her clergy, and may injure the State by severing the connection which has so long existed between them,—cannot deprive her laity of those qualities which they owe in so great a degree to her teaching and influence; but this it can do and this, I fear, much will be the effect of the measure we are now invited to pass; it can intensify and embitter those party feelings which have unhappily so long existed amongst us. It can put a stop to that era of progress and prosperity which is now beginning to dawn upon Ireland; it can exasperate and disgust by a sense of unmerited wrong—the most loyal, the most prosperous, and the most improving section of Her Majesty's subjects. Sir, it has been endeavoured to prove that a revulsion of feeling has taken place on this subject in the North of Ireland; we have been treated to boastings about the Liberal flag waving in triumph over four of the former fortresses of ascendancy in Ulster; but independently of the fact that three out of the four at one time or another returned Members holding opinions identical with those of their present representatives—a fact which rather qualifies the value of the boast—I believe that it has been indisputably proved that in two at least of these fortresses the substitution of a Liberal for a Conservative has not been owing to any revulsion of Protestant feeling, but to the influx of the Roman Catholic element, consequent on the lowering of the franchise, while in the other two I believe, the change was owing to circumstances wholly unconnected with the Church question. Sir, I believe, on the contrary, we are sustained by the increasing force of public opinion in England; the verdicts of the great constituencies of Lancashire, of Middlesex, of Kent, Surrey and Westminster, have compelled even The Times to admit that the Irish Establishment has been maintained by the superior force of English opinion against the judgment of Scotland and the resentment of Ireland. Sir, in times when Statesmen cast away like an old garment, the cherished convictions of a lifetime, when the hierarchy of a Church, whatever we may think of its tenets, possessed of the affections of such a large portion of the human race, deliberately repudiate solemn engagements entered into by their predecessors—engagements on the strength of which large concessions were obtained for their co-religionists—I fear little weight will be attached to the utterances of deceased Statesmen however eminent their services to the cause of Liberalism may have been. Sir, I should ill requite the kindness which the House has shown me by troubling it with quotations from the writings and speeches of those who, though strenuous supporters of the principles which hon. Gentlemen opposite advocate, have nevertheless left on record their matured and deliberate judgment as to the injustice of the measure we are now asked to adopt, and the evil effects which will inevitably ensue from its adoption. Sir, I ask hon. Members to recall to mind—I am certain they have often heard them quoted—the sayings of Plunket, of Grattan, of Sir James Graham, Sir George Lewis and Lord Palmerston. I ask them to pause before they commit themselves to a step which, when once taken is irrevocable, and under the vain and delusive hope of appeasing sedition and conciliating the disloyal, to inflict a cruel blow upon those who have always been the firm friends of British rule and British connection.

MR. MIALl: Sir, I should have had the greatest pleasure in sitting through this debate without taking any part in it whatever, but I have an obligation to discharge in reference to the Bill before us, both as to my past career and my recent election. I possess one qualification for speaking on the Bill which can be boasted by few Members of this House—that I was returned to the House after the Bill of the right hon. Gentleman, embodying the whole of his ecclesiastical policy for Ireland, had been laid before the House and the country. I was elected to my seat in my absence, and was so elected in order to give emphasis to the favour of my constituency towards that measure. I feel, therefore, bound to deliver to the House—and I will do so very shortly—the freshest message from outside, from an important and influential constituency, relating to the measure before us. I must say, notwithstanding the obligation that presses upon me to speak, I am rather ashamed of troubling the House. There seems to me to be an air of unreality about this Bill. We are not only re-discussing a question which was discussed to exhaustion last Session, and before the constituencies at the General Election, but we are absolutely taking into our consideration at this time a question which the country has supposed to be settled. [“No, no.”] Well, I believe a very large reward might be very safely offered to any man who should produce a new argument, or even a new shade of argument, upon this question; and I am perfectly sure that nothing whatever can be produced in this debate which would materially influence the issue of our deliberations. I myself have sought to go round the circumference of this question, and to look at it in every particular aspect, and I have a very uncomfortable conviction at this moment that I can say nothing whatever upon it which has not been said, and said better than I can say it, scores of times before. Still, I get over somewhat of that uncomfortable feeling from the great pleasure and satisfaction I have in tendering, on my own behalf and in behalf of a large section of the community with whom I have been connected in thought, in sympathy, and in action—I am satisfied and delighted at the opportunity of tendering, in my own name, and I think I may without presumption say in theirs, our most cordial thanks to the right hon. Gentleman at the head of the Government for the honourable and magnanimous manner in which he has redeemed his pledges to the country. I can partly appreciate the very costly personal sacrifice which the right hon. Gentleman must have made upon the altar of his patriotism. I have gone partially through the same experience. I can understand very well the pain which a man feels when, following the light of truth which he cannot resist, he finds himself travelling away from his early views and conclusions. I can sympathize with the right hon. Gentleman in having to undergo the vexing remarks and pitying regards of friends who disapprove the change that has taken place in his mind, harder a great deal to be endured than the assaults of malignity, the wild calumnies of your enemies, the taunts of your political adversaries, and oftentimes, and especially in this case, the wild abuse amid which “men who know not what they do” are crucifying your reputation. I say I am thankful to the right hon. Gentleman that he has risen superior to them all. I am personally indebted to him that he has revived in my bosom faith in the grander and more heroic virtues of British statesmanship—and I rejoice in the evidence which the Bill before us contains, that our faith has not been misplaced in his conscientiousness, in his truthfulness, in his grasp of great principles, in his mastery of details, and in his subordination of everything to his sense of justice. I am not this evening going to discuss the principles involved in the measure before us, because, as I said before, I think that they have been pretty well threshed out; but there are one or two remarks that I should like to make respecting the Bill, and the reasons why I shall give to it my most earnest support. Well, Sir, I regard it as a measure which is characterized by a majestic simplicity and greatness of purpose. What is that purpose? Is it to knit together in bonds of mutual trust and sympathy and affection two countries that are politically united under conditions which neither of them can destroy, and which neither of them can materially alter—conditions arising out of their relative geographical position, the tendencies and consequences of modern civilization, and the interlacing of their material interests. How is it proposed to effect the purposes to which I have just alluded? It is proposed simply to embody in the policy which we put in force towards Ireland the grand old precept—“Do unto others as ye would they should do unto you”—in short, to make justice the basis of our relations with and our conduct towards Ireland. Well, Sir, that policy must begin somewhere, and I think it rightly begins with the religious faith of the people; because none of us will for a moment deny that there is no cause more potent in irritating, and alienating, and maddening great communities of men than wounding them in their religious faith, whether it be by direct persecution or whether it be by legal contempt. In Ireland, I think the course that we have pursued in reference to the faith of the great bulk of the people has generated a tone of mind, as it always does, which operates to vitiate all susceptibility to kindness in other ways. It has exaggerated and inflamed the sense of wrong on every individual in regard to his minor and less important interests. Ireland, indeed, has long groaned beneath a sentimental grievance, and that sentimental grievance comes closely to Ireland's inmost heart. The right hon. Gentleman who has brought forward this Bill gave intimation to the House and to the country that he brought it forward simply upon the ground of doing justice to the Irish people by giving to them religious equality, and he has put before us his scheme in the most practical possible shape. He is not satisfied with producing before this House simply sympathizing thought, nor passing Resolutions which will come to nothing hereafter, or diminishing the outward and circumstantial extent of the grievances of which the Irish people complain. The Bill which he has brought forward goes to the very root of the evil, grapples manfully with the life of it, forges and wields the weapon which is to destroy it. And what is the effect of this grand simplicity of purpose? Why, Sir, for the first time for I may say half-a-century there comes across the countenance of Ireland a relaxation of her features; there is a gleam of hope, of trust, of gladness, timid and trembling, but natural and real, that shows that Ireland has passed, or is passing, the winter of her discontent. There is another evidence to which I wish to call the special attention of the House. Parliament but a very short time ago passed a measure to confer the elective franchise upon the working men; and an appeal was almost immediately afterwards made to the country to deliver its verdict upon the great question which had been put before it by the right hon. Gentleman. What was the consequence? It was that the deepest moral instincts of a people newly come into possession of political power were sensibly stirred, and in their return to the appeal which had been made to them they heartily—they almost instinctively—gave their “Aye” in favour of justice to Ireland; and even the Prime Minister himself must have been startled by the comparative unanimity, the thrilling earnestness, of the response which was made to his proposition by the working men of this country. I regard it as a most gratifying remarkable phenomenon. This question relating to Ireland did not in any way touch, or directly touch, their material interests, and if they put it in the forefront of their programme, I can bear my own personal testimony to the firm hold which the question took on their sympathy, their understanding, and their will. I can say that my presence in this House is an illustration of their interest in the question submitted to them by the Crown. No words of mine could do justice to the steady heartiness, self-denial, and indomitable persistence with which men—aye, and women too—worked and watched, wearied themselves and endured privations, in order that they might return me to this House, so giving testimony to the interest they took in the question which was then before the country. And what was the secret of it? Not that there was any personal feeling at all towards me, for I was a mere stranger, but simply because my name had been associated, whether rightly or wrongly, with this policy of religious equality both in Ireland and elsewhere. I regard this timely quickening of a strong sentiment of justice in the nation so soon after they obtained the franchise as one of the great benefits which resulted to the nation in consequence of the question having been put before them last Session. I believe I may state likewise, as another result of this simplicity of purpose in the Bill, that the right hon. Gentleman has rallied to his cause no inconsiderable portion of the religious life of the country. I put it to hon. Gentlemen opposite whether they expected that the response made, for instance, by Scotland—Protestant to the very core—to the policy put before the country before the close of last Session—whether the response made by the religious free bodies in England, all of them deeply and closely identified with what I may call Protestant principles and Protestant policy, would be what it has been. I put it to them whether they were not startled by the earnestness and promptitude and zeal and persistence with which these parties rallied round the right hon. Gentleman and supported the measure which he has brought forward. I am quite sure that this did not arise from any sectarian rivalry. I do not believe that there is in this country the slightest desire to injure the Protestant Episcopal Church in Ireland—I mean regarded as a spiritual body. She has done some good, and would have done much more if she had not been placed in a position so anomalous and so calculated to neutralize all her best efforts. I am only sorry that she does not seem to comprehend the mission with which she has been charged. And if she would consent to become a free Church, if she would throw off all the restrictions by which she is bound, she would find herself far more able to grapple with the difficulties that beset her than she now is, because hon. Gentlemen must not suppose that money and endowments are the only sources, or the sources at all, of religious life. I do not think that the Church of Ireland knows how much power she might possess beyond any that she now possesses—not, indeed, to ride in the ascendant as a political institution over the bulk of the community, but to do the work which she professes a desire to do—to hold up the Gospel to the people among whom she is placed, and to vindicate and justify that Protestant Christianity which is now stained and defiled in its reputation, not from any fault of her ministers, but simply because of her false position. I shall say nothing now respecting the great abstract principle which the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Buckinghamshire (Mr. Disraeli) placed before the House last night as the ground of his objections both to the disestablishment and the disendowment of the Irish Church. Other opportunities may perhaps occur, and especially while the Bill is going through Committee, to consider some of those objections in detail which were urged—and urged with great force I must admit—against parts of the measure with which he could not agree. But there is one, and only one, point which I shall allude to now, and it is this—The right hon. Gentleman seems to have come to the conclusion, and to have impressed it both upon the House, and upon a former occasion upon the constituencies, that in separating the exercise of political authority from religion, you remove one of the main safeguards of the civilization of man. I perfectly agree with the right hon. Gentleman. I believe as he believes, that there must be no disconnection between religion and the exercise of political authority. But is there the slightest danger of that in this Bill? I suppose that we, as Members of the Imperial Parliament, shall be able to act on precisely, if not on better motives, drawn from our common faith, after this Bill has passed than we did before. I suppose the Government of the country may be animated by as religious motives in every law which it proposes to enact after the separation of the Church from the State as it was before. The truth is, there would be no separation of religion from the exercise of political authority. I do not think that the policy which has been adopted and acted upon hitherto has produced much civilization in Ireland. If we look back upon the past—upon the Penal Code, upon the frequent suspensions of the Habeas Corpus Act, upon the restrictions and restraints that have constantly been imposed on the free action of the Irish people, I do not think that we could point to Ireland as the best illustration of the civilization which grows out of the exercise of authority in connection with religion. Well, Sir, I need hardly say I intend to vote for the second reading of this Bill. I do not intend to take part in those debates which relate to the various details connected with this measure; but, I with all my heart, and not as a sectarian—not from any mere ecclesiastical or theological bias one way or another—but from a sense, a sheer sense of the justice owing by this country to our sister country across the water, shall give my most cordial and, I may say, enthusiastic vote for the second reading of this Bill.

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE: Sir, the hon. Member who has just spoken told us when he rose that he was oppressed by a sense of the unreality of his position, and he explained the meaning of this unreality by saying that this question had been so thoroughly discussed both in the last Session and during the election contests in the autumn that no new arguments could be brought forward upon it. Well, I do not suppose that any man in this debate will bring forward any argument that has not in some shape or other been used already with regard to the question now before us, but I will venture to say this, that the arguments that we brought forward last Session or in the course of the Recess will not be employed precisely under the same circumstances as those in which they were then adduced, and that there will be some novelty about them, because they will be applied to a different subject-matter. Last Session and during the elections we were discussing abstract Resolutions and proposals put forward in a somewhat shadowy form, and we were unable to grapple with them with that certainty and confidence with which we could grapple with a Bill. We were, therefore, placed under a disadvantage, because when we brought forward this or that argument against the abstract proposals submitted to us, we were always liable to be told that we were fighting with shadows, and that the point we objected to would not be contained in the measure. But now we are discussing the measure under different circumstances, and I can assure hon. Members opposite that, whatever unreality there may be in the arguments of Gentlemen on that side of the House, of which they must be the best judges, there is no unreality in the arguments with which Gentlemen on this side endeavour to discuss the Bill fairly and thoroughly, and to lay its merits or demerits before the country. Now, I am not a little interested to see how far arguments that were thought good enough by our opponents last year will be reproduced under the different circumstances in which we now find ourselves. I listened with great interest for what might fall from the hon. Member for Bradford (Mr. Miall), first, because—as he himself told us—he represented in the freshest possible form the actual sentiments of the country with respect to this Bill, now that they have seen it. He has come delegated by a most important constituency to support a particular measure the nature of which it appears they are perfectly cognizant; and we

naturally expected to hear from him a compendious and powerful representation of the view which his constituents and those in whose name he is so well qualified to speak take of the measure before us. Sir, I was interested in what he might say for another reason; because he represents in this House not only the borough of Bradford, but in an especial manner, I think, the principles of that great body of our fellow-countrymen to whose opinions and influence I believe this measure is in a very great degree due. I was most anxious, Sir, to see how the discussion of this measure would be approached from the point of view of the representative of the English voluntaries. All through this evening, until the hon. Member for Bradford rose, the debate has been conducted with great ability and great interest by Gentlemen from Ireland. But it was quite natural and right that Englishmen also should take part in the debate, because this is not merely an Irish, but a national and an Imperial question—and a question on which it is very important that we should hear the sentiments of Gentlemen of all shades of opinion. In the debate of last evening there were several Gentlemen who approached this subject from different points of view; and there was one hon. Gentleman, a new Member of this House, to whose speech, although very short, I listened with very great pleasure—I mean the hon. Member for Bandon (Mr. Shaw) who told us he approached it from the Irish Churchman's point of view, and seemed to complain that English Churchmen took an inadequate view of the question, and that the views of Irish Churchmen were those which ought rather to be attended to. Now, I entirely admit that on the questions of detail, and especially with respect to the probable practical working of the scheme contained in this Bill, we ought to have a very great regard to the opinions of an Irish Churchman. But with reference to the great broad principles on which this measure is founded, I am afraid we can hardly think so much of what Irish Churchmen say about it, because I am rather inclined to think that so far as they have shown leanings in this debate, they—even those of them who sit on the other side of the House—are not altogether satisfied with the frame of the measure. Three of them spoke last night, and the impression they produced on my mind was that if they had had their way the Bill would have been of a somewhat different character. The hon. Member for Galway (Mr. Gregory) spoke. We know what his opinions have been, and we know also from the remarks he made last night what, if he had had his way, this Bill would have been. We know that he was dissatisfied with one important portion of this scheme—namely, the source for which the compensation to be given for the withdrawal of the Maynooth Grant and the Regium Donum is to be derived. But what did that hon. Gentleman tell us? He said, admitting that this part of the Bill was not altogether according to what he thought was right, yet, in deference to the Gentlemen who sit about him—that is, as I understand him, in deference to the Scotch Members and the representatives of the English voluntaries—he was prepared to sacrifice his own private opinion and support this measure. [Mr. GREGORY: Hear, hear!] I find that I do not misrepresent the hon. Gentleman. I gathered even from a more important quarter—from the speech of the Chief Secretary for Ireland—that if that right hon. Gentleman had had his own way he would have liked to give a different character to this Bill. He told us, and told us truly, that for years past—as all who have had the pleasure of sitting with him in this House can testify—he had desired to see a measure of religious equality introduced into Ireland. But he also gave us to understand that, so far as he was concerned, the measure which he would have preferred would have been a measure that would have elevated the position of the Roman Catholics rather than one of disendowment and destruction all round. But it appeared that he, too, had to give way and sacrifice his own opinions to the necessities of the party with which he acts. And there was one rather remarkable expression which he let fall when he told us that this measure had the support not only of the majority of “thinking” people, but, as he said with considerable emphasis, the support of the “unthinking” people also. Now there is no doubt that it is one of the main supports of the Bill that it has the adhesion of such a large number of “unthinking” people. And when the

hon. Member for Bradford (Mr. Miall) rose, I was in hopes that we were going to have a little of something to counter-balance that—some explanation of the grounds on which not “unthinking,” but “thinking” men support it. Well, I must say I was very much disappointed by the speech of that hon. Member. Whether it is that he felt that there is a sort of unreality in the arguments which he adduced, or, for whatever reason I am unable to divine, his speech was certainly not of that convincing and striking character which we should expect from a Gentleman of his ability and position. What did he tell us with regard to this Bill? With regard, for instance, to the Irish reason for bringing it forward—for I believe there are two classes of reasons for bringing forward and supporting this Bill—there is what I call the Irish class of reasons, arising out of the state of affairs in Ireland; and there is what I may call the religious class of reasons, arising out of the great progress which has been made by what may be described as voluntary opinions in this country. What, I say, did the hon. Member for Bradford tell us with regard to the Irish part of the question? I forget his exact expressions, but he spoke as if this was to be the beginning of a new system of policy from England towards Ireland—as if this was to be the beginning of the relaxation of those restrictions under which Ireland had been suffering, and which had been the cause of so much ill-feeling between the two countries. He spoke as if the history of the last thirty years had been a blank—as if we were really now just in the same position as we were in when discussing the question of Roman Catholic Emancipation, and, perhaps, I might go even further back and say when we were discussing the question of the relaxation of the most strict articles in the Penal Code. Sir, we are not at the commencement of a new policy towards Ireland. When you speak of a new policy, let me say that with regard to the more cordial and friendly tone which England adopts in her relations towards Ireland we are not at the commencement of that state of things. For a great many years, and throughout the political life-time of all the public men of the present day, we have been steadily pursuing a course towards Ireland which was intended to have,

and which has had, the effect of very much improving the relations between the two countries. We have been laying aside those old feelings, and therefore I say it is an entire misconception and delusion to speak as if this was the first beginning of the break-up of a long frost—the first beginning of the restoration, or rather of the creation, of feelings of amity and kindness between the two countries. And I say it is the use of language like that which has such effect on those “unthinking” people on whom the Chief Secretary for Ireland places so much reliance. And it is because people are deluded by the eloquent speeches of men like the hon. Member for Bradford, full of platitudes, as I must call them, and false representations of that kind, that those who do not know the real state of English feeling nor the history of the last half or last quarter-of-a-century, are carried away by their enthusiasm to support some measure of this character. Then we also have appeals to another class of men—the intelligent foreigners, for instance, with respect to whom precisely the same thing holds good. These intelligent foreigners are not much acquainted with the exact course of our recent history. They know, perhaps, what went on many years ago. They probably have read the history of all the evils of the 18th century; and when they hear men who ought to know better—men in authority in this country—rising and speaking as if that state of things still continued between England and Ireland, they are naturally led to believe that the fact is so, and they accordingly give expression to strong feelings on the subject. But I contend that it is perfectly unfair and most unfortunate that that style of language and of argumentation should prevail among us. Now, the hon. Member for Bandon (Mr. Shaw), to whom I just now alluded, among several other good things which he said, made this remark, with which I felt very much inclined to sympathize. He said that for his part he did not like a discussion which had to be carried on in five-syllabled words. He gave rather—if he will forgive me for saying so—a Hibernian character to that expression, by proceeding to mention as one of the five-syllabled words to which he objected the word “robbery.” Whether that particular word is or is not five-syllabled is not of so much importance; but I thoroughly sympathize with the hon. Gentleman in his dislike to those vague and high-sounding phrases which carry too much weight with them in proportion to their intrinsic merits. I wish that the hon. Member for Bandon would exercise his influence with some Gentlemen on his own side of the House, and ask them to be a little careful in the use of some of those five-syllabled words, and also a little careful how they use certain phrases that have a very grand sound, but of which the meaning is extremely indefinite. We hear, for example, a good deal about “religious equality.” I think we might very profitably ask hon. Gentlemen to define a little more clearly what it is precisely that they mean by that phrase. I am not going to speak at this time about the term “religious equality,” but I want to say a few words on another phrase which is very much in vogue on the other side of the House, and which has some kind of co-relation to religious equality—that is to say, the phrase “Protestant ascendancy.” And I very much want to know what it is that hon. Members mean in the present day when they speak of Protestant ascendancy. With that expression we have been historically familiar for a long time past, but recently, and especially, I may say, last night, a very peculiar importance appeared to me to be attached to that phrase by the mode in which it was used. My hon. Friend the Member for South-west Lancashire (Mr. Cross) reminded the House last night of an eloquent passage in the speech delivered by the First Minister of the Crown on the platform at Wigan. It was to the effect that this question of the Irish Church was only a branch of a much larger question, that it was only one of many questions which like itself were branches from a larger stock or trunk; that that stock or trunk was Protestant ascendancy, and that it was for the hewing down of that trunk that he and his friends were prepared to gird themselves up and to use all their exertions. Now, among the questions mentioned as forming one of the branches was that of the land in Ireland, and I must confess it puzzled me to understand how it could be that the land question could be called a branch of the trunk of Protestant as-

ascendancy. However, when the passage was quoted it was evident it was not a mere rhetorical flourish, because the Prime Minister immediately and in a marked manner, cheered the passage, and shortly afterwards the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary for Ireland, rising and referring to the quotation, accepted it on the part of the Government with the manifest approbation of those around him, and told us that that was indeed a true description of the policy of the Government. That, of course, makes us still more anxious to know what this Protestant ascendancy really is. We know what it was a century ago. It then meant that the Roman Catholic population of Ireland were in every sense of the word a down-trodden people. They were excluded, not only from political privileges and rights, not only from office, from a share in the representation of the country, and even from the right of voting for representatives; but they were even excluded from the liberal professions, from every social privilege, and from the ordinary rights of citizens in regard to the tenure of land. If at that time a Minister of England, speaking of Protestant ascendancy, and saying he was about to demolish it, had been desirous of enumerating some of the branches of the trunk he was attacking, I can easily understand that he would have mentioned the land question as one them. But the Protestant ascendancy no longer represents anything of that kind. The Roman Catholics are now admitted to an equality with Protestants in all matters affecting their political and social position. And yet there still remains their bugbear of Protestant ascendancy with which hon. Gentlemen are able to conjure and alarm the people. But the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary went on to tell us something which seemed to throw a light on what he meant. He told us that when he spoke of the Irish Roman Catholics he spoke of the Irish people, and that, I believe, was one of the most effective sentences in his speech. At all events, it was one which elicited great applause on the other side of the House, and it was one of which, in a certain sense, it is impossible to deny the truth and appropriateness. But if the term "Irish Roman Catholic" is synonymous with the Irish people, with what is the term "Irish Protestant" supposed to be synonymous? I suppose that Protestant ascendancy means English ascendancy, and that in point of fact what these Gentlemen are aiming at is the extinction of what they would call English ascendancy in Ireland. ["No, no!"] I do not mean when I use that expression that I suppose hon. Gentlemen are directly advocating a separation between the two countries; but what I understand them to mean—and it is the gist of a great many of the speeches we have heard—is that the Protestant Church in Ireland, as standing towards the Irish people, is an alien Church. Indeed, hon. Gentlemen are fond of telling us so. Some hon. Gentlemen have said that it is not the Church of Ireland, but the Church of the English residents in Ireland, and that it is, in fact, an English Church planted in Ireland. Now, what I understand them to desire is to put down in every possible way that ascendancy, as they call it, of that Church as the representative of English as contradistinguished from Irish feeling. If, however, that really is the policy which hon. Members are pursuing, and if the spirit of that policy is to animate them in their dealings with the other branches of this great question, such as the land question, I think we have a right, and it is important, to ask what are the guiding principles you intend to follow in dealing with other branches, because it would be extremely curious to see how hon. Gentlemen would apply the new construction they put on the word ascendancy when they come to deal with what they call the English ascendancy in regard to the land? We see what they mean when they speak of ascendancy in the matter of the Church. They do not mean that the Roman Catholic people are debarred from any social rights or privileges, or that the people of Ireland are in a disadvantageous position with regard to their own ecclesiastical arrangements. Nor do they mean that it is desirable to give assistance to the Roman Catholic people, or to raise them to a higher position than they now occupy. What they do mean is, that it is a wrong to Ireland that the English Church should retain its property. I want to know whether the same principle is to be applied to the English landowners when we come to talk of ascendancy as connected with the land?

[“Oh, oh!”] Well, hon. Gentlemen groan at that, and I do not wonder at it; but will they tell me what in the world is the meaning of the mysterious and oracular sentence which was quoted and applied by them so as to mean that there is in Ireland a Protestant ascendancy which ought to be destroyed, and that one of the branches of that trunk is the relation between landlord and tenant? It is all very well for hon. Members to adopt the policy which they have adopted; but whenever we proceed to argue from what they tell us to what the natural consequence is, they interrupt us by groaning. What we want is, that some one of them should get up and make believe that we are thinking people, which probably, in their opinion, we are not. Making believe that we are able to understand, will they tell us, and through the House the country, what their real policy is, and what it is they are driving at? All we know with regard to the question of the land is that, whereas we were told last year that it was one of the most important and pressing subjects in the world, the policy of the Government in regard to it is now carefully kept in the background, and only a very little corner of the curtain which conceals it is lifted by the Bill. We hear of the experiment of peasant proprietorships and the establishment of small owners, whose properties are to be mortgaged to the State for three-fourths of their value. Now, I should like to know whether that is the kind of statesmanship which is to be applied to Ireland? It may throw a good deal of light on the future state of affairs in that country; but there is no use in hon. Gentlemen interrupting and groaning when one uses an argument of this sort unless they are prepared to explain what they really mean. With regard to this policy, I maintain that we are proposing to proceed on an entirely false basis. I believe that the Established Church of England, and especially that branch of it established in Ireland, is open to the most serious comments, criticisms, and censures from hon. Gentlemen opposite, from hon. Gentlemen on this side of the House, and from the country at large. I entirely agree that there is no defence whatever to be made for the conduct which this country pursued towards Ireland for a very long series of years, and that there is no defence whatever to be made for the part which the Established Church was made to play in reference to that conduct. Unfortunately for Ireland, and perhaps still more unfortunately for the Church itself, we cannot deny the truth of a great deal of what has been said on this subject. But it does not follow that because the relations of England and of the Church with Ireland have been bad they should always continue so. The real fact is that the Established Church of Ireland has been influenced by the spirit of the people of England. It has been a representative and sometimes a caricaturist of the faults or of the impulses of England; and what you really want to cure is not the existence or the machinery of this or that Establishment; but what you want to cure is the spirit with which England was animated when she treated Ireland as if she were a bond slave. When England was ready to screw down Ireland to the lowest point and to make a gain out of her in every possible way it was no wonder that she used the Church as an instrument of oppression. It was not only in ecclesiastical matters that England treated Ireland in this tyrannical manner. People often speak as if the Penal Laws were all enacted in the interests of the Church, and, perhaps, even at the suggestion of the Church, and as if there were no other considerations in the matter. But we must remember what the commercial policy of England has been towards Ireland. The spirit which pervaded the whole of our ecclesiastical relations with Ireland in the last century likewise pervaded our commercial relations with that country at the same period. England destroyed her trade and crippled her shipping, and it was during that period that the Church was made an instrument of oppression. But it is our duty not to throw aside or break up this instrument which we have in our hands in the Established Church, an instrument which I believe to be as fully capable for doing good and conveying the kindly sentiments of England to Ireland as of doing harm, or conveying her evil spirit. We ought, I say, to endeavour to improve our relations with that country. I say more, we have been doing this, and if I am asked what it is we look to for the future, I would answer, we look to the continuance of the policy on which this country has been acting for the last thirty or forty years—tentatively no doubt—slowly and imperfectly, perhaps, but at the same time with very satisfactory results. Those results are, of course, not yet completely satisfactory. The right hon. Gentleman at the head of the Government twitted me last year when I ventured to observe that Ireland required a long course of just and considerate legislation. The right hon. Gentleman asked if a period of 700 years was not a long time for the work of conciliation. Yes, Sir, but we have not been at that work for that period. For perhaps 650 years we have been working in an opposite direction, while it is only during the last thirty or forty years that we have been trying to undo that work; nor ought it to be so much a matter of surprise to some hon. Gentlemen that we have not been able, within that comparatively short time, to undo all the evils which we had so sedulously laboured to create. We have, however, accomplished a good deal, and everybody who will look back and compare the relations between the two countries which now exist, and those which existed half-a-century ago, must, I think, admit that there is a great improvement, not only in the material condition of Ireland, but in the spirit with which she and this country regard one another. What we ask, then, is that you will not begin this work of yours by doing a great wrong to Ireland in the interest of England. What I regard as the most real and bitter sarcasm in your Bill is the provision which you have inserted in it dealing with the grant to Maynooth and the Regium Donum. You are anxious, you say, to commence a policy of conciliation towards Ireland, and what is the first thing you do? Do you make any sacrifice on the part of England—any pecuniary sacrifice or any sacrifice of prejudice? Neither of the one nor the other; but you pander to the prejudices of the voluntaries, to whose conception this Bill is, I believe, in a great measure due, and subserve the interests of the British Exchequer by, in the first instance, robbing Ireland of an annuity of £70,000 or £80,000 a year. That circumstance in itself raises a suspicion, and the suspicion is not lessened by the knowledge that this is done, so far as I understand, in contravention of the pledges which I thought we had given last year. I understood that it was on no account to be admitted that England should profit by this property which you are about to take from the Church in Ireland. We were led to suppose that this act of spoliation was to be one of the purest and most self-sacrificing that were ever committed. Now, on the contrary, we find that the only one thing about which we can feel quite certain in the pecuniary arrangements of this Bill is that about £1,100,000 is to find its way into the English Exchequer. There are other pecuniary arrangements also, about which much may be said; but I do not mean to enter at present into these questions, because they may be looked upon as being really rather questions of detail than of principle. What I wish now to impress on the House is my conviction that it is not for the interest of this great kingdom of England, Scotland, and Ireland herself, and not consistent with the duty of this country taken from the highest point of view, to adopt this measure for the destruction of the Irish Established Church. We must bear in mind that England is not for the English nor Ireland for the Irish, and yet I believe that if you pursue that principle of destroying Protestant ascendancy or English ascendancy to its full and legitimate consequences, you will eventually find yourselves landed in the doctrine of Ireland for the Irish. You may not be prepared to go that length, but such will be the result of your policy; and you may depend upon it that anything which tends to bring about such a result, and to close up the sympathy of the two countries for one another, and to diminish the influence which the one ought to have on the other, will be bad for both. The influence of England on Ireland may, I believe, be extremely beneficially exercised if only exercised judiciously. You must have an English population or a population sympathizing with and representing England in Ireland. You ought to put these people on the footing which is best suited to their national character, and which will enable them to develop that character in the best possible way. It accords with the genius of England that that should be done by means of the Established Church. I do not for a moment dispute that the voluntary bodies in this country are of very essential service to the State. I do not deny that they act in many respects as a useful adjunct to the system of the Established Church, and I have no doubt that many of them with their great zeal, and comparatively greater freedom, are of advantage to us in various ways. But I am of opinion that England with an Established Church and a considerable number of voluntaries independent of it is in a very much more favourable condition for the human mind than if we had only these voluntary bodies by themselves. I maintain, then, that it would be injurious to England, and if so it would be injurious to Ireland—which is so closely connected with this country—to destroy an institution which I look upon as being of such essential value to the English character. Very great weight, I think, ought to be attached to what fell from my right hon. and learned Friend the Member for the University of Dublin (Dr. Ball) this evening as to the effect which would be produced in Ireland by converting the Established Church in that country into a mere voluntary body. It seems to me, speaking not from a personal or special acquaintance with Ireland, but from a general acquaintance with the principles of human nature, that my right hon. Friend is right, and that if we reduce the Established Church in Ireland to the position of a voluntary body and send it out into the world in an impoverished condition, which is proposed, the result will be to create strife and contention, and to convert it into an aggressive body, which is not at present its character. I repudiate the argument which some hon. Members use when they say that the English Church has failed in Ireland because she has not succeeded in making a greater number of proselytes. My answer to that argument is that it is not her mission to make proselytes. What I consider her mission to be is to soften asperities between the two religions in Ireland, not by in any way sacrificing the distinctive doctrines which she herself holds, surrendering an atom of the truth, or aping the practices of other communions, but by displaying herself in her true colours, and by showing of what English Churchmanship really consists. My belief is that if the members of the Anglican Church, either in England or Ireland, would devote themselves to showing the true spirit of that

Church, and how she can make plain the truth and right by being liberal and charitable towards others, she would do a great deal of good, not by proselytizing, but by winning souls to her and softening the asperities between races. It is my opinion that if you look forward to the gradual fusion or the cordial union of the Celtic and Anglo-Saxon races in Ireland, you must trust to the operation of these influences, and I therefore say that you are not acting with true kindness to Ireland, or taking the proper steps to produce harmony between her and England by proposing such a measure as that before the House. I will yield to no man in the desire to act fairly and even liberally toward Ireland. We owe her, I think, great reparation for great and long-continued wrong, and if I thought the proposal of the right hon. Gentleman at the head of the Government would conduce to her tranquillity and happiness, I should put aside any prejudices which I may have and support that proposal. But it is because I am sincerely convinced that it will have rather a contrary effect that I feel it to be my duty to offer to this Bill my decided opposition.

MR. BRIGHT: Mr. Speaker, not a few of the Members of the House are well aware that for many years—I may say from the first hour almost when I was competent to give an opinion on the politics of this country—I have had a very decided opinion on the question that is to-night before the House. Therefore it may not be improper that I should take part in this important debate. I was glad when I heard that the right hon. Gentleman who moved the Amendment—at the head of what is still a considerable party—intended to debate this question, and to divide the House upon the second reading of this Bill. Because, although the details of the measure, as the House has already heard, are many of them of great importance, yet it must be admitted on both sides of the House that the real and essential good or evil of the measure is to be found, not in any one of its details, but in the principle on which it is founded. We have to decide this—whether the Protestant Established Church in Ireland shall cease to exist as a State institution. And it is not because Establishments have been universally condemned throughout the kingdom. That is not alleged at all; for, though I myself have no faith in political religious Establishments, and believe in the voluntary principle, yet I am willing to admit—and it would be foolish not to admit it—that at present a belief in the usefulness of Established Churches appears in this country to have the sanction of a majority of our people. The question is not at all, whether Establishments are good in themselves or good anywhere, but whether, with regard to Ireland, it is necessary that the Church Establishment shall be removed. After all, perhaps it might be well to ask the House whether we believe there is a great Irish question—that it meets us every day—that we are compelled at last to confront it, and whether for the settlement of that question, if there be such a question, it is necessary that the Irish State Church shall be removed. Is there a great Irish question and a great Irish difficulty? The right hon. Gentleman who has just resumed his seat (Sir Stafford Northcote) has made a speech that he might have made on the most trivial question that could come before the House. There was not a sign from the first word of the speech to the last that he was considering or grappling with—or, indeed, that there existed—a great and serious question that was before the House with reference to Ireland. I shall call only one witness in proof of my opinion that there is such a question, and that we cannot avoid it. And I shall not appeal, as I might do, to the almost unanimous judgment of the civilized and Christian world. I will not appeal to the divisions, and the debates, and the majorities of the last Parliament upon this question. I will not appeal to the opinion and to the great verdict of the new constituencies; and I will not appeal to the chronic or spasmodic discontent—whichever you please—which exists in Ireland. I will call only one witness, and he shall be a Member, and an eminent Member of this House. I will call the son of the long-trusted Leader of your party, who has been an eminent Member of at least two Administrations formed by Gentlemen who sit on that side of the House, and who has been for many years, as we all know, the most trusted and confidential adviser and counsellor of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Buckinghamshire. I shall appeal to the opinion and to the public declarations of the noble Lord the Member for King's Lynn (Lord Stanley). I think that, on a former occasion, whether in the House or out of it I am not sure, I referred to a remarkable statement of that noble Lord at a remarkable time. The House will remember a great Conservative banquet that was held at Bristol fifteen or sixteen months ago.—[“Hear, hear!”]—The hon. Gentleman who cheers, perhaps, was present at it. Now, the noble Lord the Member for King's Lynn is not a person who is guilty of “heedless rhetoric.” There are few men in this House better informed. There is no one in this House more calm and impartial in his judgment. I know no speaker who is more measured and careful in his language. Yet, what was it that the noble Lord said, not in the heat of debate in this House—and that probably would not have affected him—but to a great party of his own friends at this political banquet at Bristol? This was what he said. He spoke of Ireland with evident feeling. He is the son of a great Irish proprietor. He is not unacquainted with that country. I think on one occasion he said he knew every tenant upon his father's estate—a great deal more than many English proprietors of land in Ireland could say. At this banquet he spoke of Ireland, and these were the words he used. He spoke of—

“The painful, the dangerous, and to us, in appearance at least, the discreditable state of things which continues to exist in Ireland.”

He described it as “a miserable state of things.” He said—

“We have a strange and perplexing problem to solve. If we look for a remedy, who is there can give us an intelligible answer?”

Such was his despair of this question; and he concluded with this emphatic declaration: “Ireland is the question of the hour.” Well, Sir, I am not sure that since Belshazzar's feast there has been any announcement more startling, more solemn, or more calculated to disturb the merriment of a great and joyous banquet. If I had used these words in a speech they might have been thought an exaggeration of the case; and if my right hon. Friend at the head of the Government had opened his great speech with these words they would not have been more solemn than the occasion demanded. But what happened? Parliament met a little more than a year ago, and the right hon. Gentleman and his Friends were upon this (the Treasury) Bench; and I was where the hon. Member for Portsmouth (Sir James Elphinstone) sits, watching carefully all that took place. On the night when my hon. Friend the Member for Cork (Mr. Maguire) brought forward his Motion we were all expecting the explanation of the policy of the Government with regard to Ireland. An announcement had been made only a few days before in the other House of Parliament that the policy of the Government would soon be explained from this Bench, and the Earl of Mayo, on that occasion, the Chief Secretary for Ireland, rose and addressed the House for the exact time of three hours and twenty minutes. I noticed that the speech of my right hon. Friend the First Lord of the Treasury the other night in introducing this Bill took precisely the same time. But I observed—what the House must have observed—that there was a great difference between these two speeches. Lord Mayo spoke of the material improvement of Ireland, and he gave us large sums in figures to show us how that improvement had proceeded. He admitted the grievance of the ecclesiastical inequality existing in Ireland, and he indicated a mode of dealing with it that was felt to be so absolutely impossible, that afterwards, under the pressure of the difficulties in which it involved his Colleagues, he repudiated it and denied it; and it finally ended in this—that the Government had no policy at all. Sir, I hope that Lord Mayo, who has since been promoted to the Governor Generalship of India, may find in that country no difficulties with which his kindly nature and his good intentions may be unable to cope. I said there was a difference between the two speeches although they were of the same length. The speech of my right hon. Friend, instead of having no policy, or a policy which he was condemned afterwards to deny and repudiate, was one which elaborated a grand policy for Ireland—a policy which is included in this Bill—and it is so balanced and so complete that I ask the House on both sides if it be not a fact that it has attracted to it the sympathy and support of the great bulk of the people of the three kingdoms. [“No!”] I say that your speeches during this debate are proof that you feel it. Protestant England and still more Protestant Scotland, have joined heartily with Catholic Ireland in approving the policy which is set forth in the details of this Bill. The matter stands thus—that there is an Irish question, and the noble Lord the Member for King's Lynn is my witness for it; and there is an ecclesiastical grievance in Ireland, and the Governor General of India is my authority for that statement. And last Session they were Members of your Cabinet, and were in constant daily communication with the Prime Minister the Earl of Derby, and subsequently with his successor the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Disraeli) who sits opposite me. But it was a question that the late Government was totally unable to grapple with. They did nothing, not because they did not comprehend the question. The right hon. Gentleman comprehends all these questions just as well as any man in the House. He understood this question twenty years ago. But to show how totally unable the late Government was to deal with this question, I appeal to those Members of the House who were here last year. They will recollect that the speeches of Lord Mayo, of the noble Lord the Member for King's Lynn, of the right hon. Gentleman the late Secretary of State for the Home Department (Mr. Gathorne Hardy), and of the right hon. Gentleman since, in that party, First Minister—that these speeches did not agree; that in point of fact in all they said on the floor of the House there was just as much confusion of speech as there has been on Irish affairs for centuries past. The noble Lord the Member for King's Lynn said that the patient was in a desperate and almost hopeless state. Lord Mayo said that he was wonderfully better. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Buckinghamshire said he was perfectly well, and his condition was eminently satisfactory. And the right hon. Gentleman the late Home Secretary—he took all the febrile symptoms of the patient as indications of perfect health. And it proved what the country found out at the elections, that the Government of the right hon. Gentleman did not comprehend the malady, or had not the courage or the power to grapple with it. And the constituencies decided that as this was a great question that must be confronted it was desirable to have a Parliament and a Government that could satisfactorily deal with it. The hon. Baronet the Member for Londonderry County (Sir Frederick Heygate) asked a question which the right hon. Baronet (Sir Stafford Northcote) has asked within the last hour—what is meant by Protestant ascendancy? The hon. Member for Londonderry said he had never seen it, and that he did not comprehend it; and there was such child-like simplicity in his manner of asking it as made me believe that he really was saying exactly what he thought. May I ask hon. Gentlemen opposite—not those on this side of the House, for we are a good deal convinced—and though it has been said that nobody is convinced by a speech in this House, and it would be presumption in me to suppose I could convince anybody, yet as we differ I should like to ask hon. Gentlemen opposite a question or two. Is it or is it not a fact that the Established Church in Ireland is the Church of conquest? The right hon. and learned Gentleman (Dr. Ball), who made so powerful a speech to-night from the other side of the House, said that this Church was based on a certain Act of Parliament, which declared that unless the Bishops and clergy would preach, pray, and perform the services of religion according to the pattern of the Church of England, they could not hold sees and livings in Ireland. Now, what is an Act of Parliament—that is to say, an Act of the English Parliament and Government? It was merely a mode of asserting the power which conquest had given to England. The Church in Ireland is therefore the Church of conquest. Not only was it historically so, but I will maintain—and there is no Member of this House who will deny it—that by no possibility can the Church of a small minority of Protestants remain for 300 years established in the midst of a nation of Catholics except by the power which founded it—namely, the power of conquest. [“Hear, hear!”] I am amazed at hon. Gentlemen disputing that, if anybody is disposed to dispute it; but if they do not dispute it, I am amazed that they do not perceive the tremendous violation of the principles of the Protestant Reformation that is involved in that state of things. For if the Protestant Reformation did not mean that any one of us may hold the opinions which belong to our consciences and our convictions, surely it meant at any rate that a nation may make its own choice of its own Church and its own mode of worship; and, therefore, to establish a Protestant Church—the Church of a small minority of the people as the State Church—in the midst of a Catholic nation was the most flagrant violation of the principles of the Reformation that has taken place, I will be bound to say in Europe since the days of Luther. But, if that be so, what is it that has maintained it from that time to this? The right hon. Baronet who has just spoken from the opposite Bench (Sir Stafford Northcote) spoke of the Penal Code exactly as we speak of it, and he condemns those who in the last century supported the cruelties and enormities of that system. Why, fifty years hence—it may be said to be a safe prophecy, as there will not be many of us here to know whether it comes true or not,—but fifty years hence there will be men on the Conservative side of this House—for there will always be a Conservative side—who, looking back to the conduct of their party in the year 1869, will express their amazement that intelligent men were found, after the experience of 300 years, to support the State Church of Ireland. The right hon. Baronet (Sir Stafford Northcote) sneered at the opinions of the intelligent foreigner. Well, I have in my hand the expressed opinion of a very intelligent foreigner, who whilst he was living was known to many Members of this House—I refer to the late eminent Italian Statesman—Count Cavour. My friend Dr. Hodgson has made an admirable translation of Count Cavour's work on Ireland, an extract of which, if the House will permit me, I should like to read, because it brings down the question a little from the ground of abstract reasoning to that of contemporary judgment. He says—

“The results of this inhuman code were lamentable. The cruelty was purely gratuitous, for, far from losing strength, Catholicism became all the stronger from the hatred with which the poor Irish regarded the religion of their oppressors. Every attempt at conversion failed. The English Parliament, in the belief that it was promoting the established religion, merely, by its unjust laws, placed at the mercy of the rich Protestant proprietors of the soil the Catholic population, who in three-fourths of the country were almost exclusively its cultivators. The Penal Laws, which at first religious fanaticism had inspired, lost by degrees their primitive character, and in the hands of those who applied them became a means of social domination. During the greatest part of the eighteenth century, the Irish peasant was reduced to a state of slavery worse than that of the negro in the Antilles. Thanks to anti-Catholic legislation, and to the manner in which it was applied, it was more difficult for him to obtain justice from a Protestant grand jury than it is now for a slave in the French colonies to obtain it from the magistrates sent out from the mother country to administer the laws. During this period Ireland presents the saddest spectacle to be found in any civilized society—complete and absolute oppression of the poor by the rich; of him who labours by him who possesses, organized by the law, and maintained by the ministers of justice."

That statement will be admitted to be true. ["No, no!"] Hon. Gentlemen who say "No" know Ireland only in her better days, and I am sorry their reading has not been more extensive on this subject, as otherwise they might have been better informed. Well, then, for 300 years I say there has been a perpetual protest against this state of things; and the Irish people—for I use the term, notwithstanding what the right hon. Gentleman said—or nine-tenths of the population of Ireland, have during the whole of that time, every day and every hour, in some shape or other, protested against the continuance of that State Church. Some Members have said, "You have a State Church in England, and nobody complains of it." But though I may think the State Church in England not a good institution, yet it is not to me a sign of foreign conquest. My forefathers were members of the State Church, though for reasons they thought sufficient they left it; but if the State Church had been inflicted upon us by a power from across the Channel, I am not sure that any of us who do not agree with it would have regarded it with that tranquil mind with which we can look upon it now. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Buckinghamshire (Mr. Disraeli) last night treated us to a little of that kind of history which he often introduces into his speeches. He said he thought there was no guarantee in this country for liberty and toleration like that of the Established Church. The right hon. Gentleman—I judge from his speech at Edinburgh a year or two ago, from his speech last night, and from some other speeches—reads a different history from anybody else; or rather, perhaps, he makes up his history as he goes along. He reminds me of what was said, I think, of Voltaire, that he wrote history far better without facts than with them. If he thinks it is true that the Church has been so favourable to liberty in this country, some of us, who are Dissenters, and whose parents and grand-parents have been Nonconformists, have a very different opinion. I recollect that Hume, the historian, who was not at all favourable or friendly to such views as I entertain, observes, speaking of a time with which most of us are in some degree familiar—

"So absolute was the authority of the Crown that the precious spark of liberty had been kindled and preserved by the Puritans alone, and it is to that sect that Englishmen owe the whole freedom of their Constitution."

I suspect that the Nonconformist party in this country have succeeded to the heritage left them by those who are termed Puritans. Well, but Scotland also has its State Church, and England tried at one time to force its system upon Scotland, but most happily failed. I agree with my hon. Friend the Member for Bradford (Mr. Miall) that there is no point in which you can touch or insult or wound a nation so intolerably as when you meddle with its religious institutions, its conscience, and its mode of worship. You may send an alien Governor General or Lord Lieutenant to Ireland, you may send alien Judges, you may impose taxes partially and harshly, and by-and-by the people will become accustomed to that state of things, and apparently not unwilling to wear the chain; but if you wound them in this tenderest part, their religion, that is an injury that can never be forgotten, and there can be no cure for it but by removing entirely the cause of the wound. Now there are two things that your Church has professed to do. I heard from the noble Lord who spoke from the second Bench to-night (Viscount Crichton)—and I am surprised, I must say, that Gentlemen who speak with so much mildness and so much fairness here, are really unable to discover the greatness of the grievance which this Established Church is in their country—I heard, I say, from the noble Lord the Member for Enniskillen, that the Church of Ireland was not intended to be a Church to convert the Catholics. That was not said at the time of its foundation, and has not been said by many of its friends since; and the defence that I have heard in this House, and have often seen in the public Press, is that it is a Church that is to do something, what it can, to convert Catholics to Protestantism. The right hon. Gentleman the late Secretary of State for the Home Department (Mr. Gathorne Hardy) said it was to hold out the lamp, or the light, of the Reformation in the dark places of Ireland. Well, then, I say, that if the Established Church of Ireland has a pretence for its existence, it is that it shall do something to bring over the people of Ireland to the Protestant religion; and, secondly, that it shall help to unite Ireland with Great Britain in a friendly and permanent union. Has it been a success or a failure? I ask the hon. Baronet the Member for Londonderry County (Sir Frederick Heygate)—I put my question to him, because it is impossible not to see that he has some sympathy on this question, certainly with the condition of Ireland, if not with the remedy that we propose—I ask him whether, as a matter of conversion, the Established Church has been a success or a failure? He will say, as I shall say, and as no man will deny, that history, in all its saddest pages, has not a case of greater and more complete failure in that respect. Is it not known perfectly to all of us that Ireland is more Catholic at this moment than it has ever been before; and what, I think is much worse than that, that Ireland is more Roman than any other Catholic country probably in Europe? And what is more, from Ireland has come to England whatever there is of power that belongs to the Papal system in this country, and from Ireland has overflowed and settled on the continent of America a very great and powerful Catholic interest. And therefore, as far as that is concerned, it seems to me to be that no failure could be more complete. I have said many years ago, and I repeat it now, that by the policy which England has pursued in Ireland we have made Catholicism, not a faith only to which people cling with a desperate and heroic tenacity, but we have made it a patriotism for which multitudes of her children are willing to suffer, and, if necessary, even to die. And what should be more likely than that, because this State Church, this Protestant ascendancy which hon. Gentlemen opposite profess not to comprehend, has been for three centuries

leagued with every form of injustice of which the Irish people have complained, whether connected with the confiscation of their soil, or with the terrors and cruelties of the odious Penal Code, or with the administration of the law, or with any social tyranny to which they have been subjected? I would quote again three lines from that essay of Count Cavour's on this point, in which he says—

“The Church remains, to the Catholics, a representative of the causes of their miseries, a sign of defeat and oppression. It exasperates their sufferings and makes their humiliation more keenly felt.”

And if I pass from this question of conversion, it is to come to one that seems to me really to possess greater importance—has it done anything to bind Ireland to Great Britain? [“Yes.”] Well, it has—just as the police and the soldiery have—but in no other way, and to no greater extent. The policy of the Act of Union, in my opinion, was a wise policy; the mode by which it was brought about was one of unexampled corruption and of wrong. You revere the Act of Union, and last Session you had, I think, the Fifth Article read by the Clerk at the Table. You will not have a word or a letter of it changed or touched; and yet, strange to say, everybody but your own party believes that your policy makes union absolutely impossible—that you conduct the affairs of Ireland upon such a principle that you create a sense of wrong which over-rides all written words and all parchment covenants. For centuries, we all know, Ireland has been restless, turbulent, and insurrectionary. The right hon. Gentleman opposite admitted that in part of his speech last night; and during the Recess—I forget now exactly where it was or when—he attributed much of it to the fact that the Irish lived in a country where they had a damp climate and in the neighbourhood of a melancholy ocean. Now, I have not the least objection to a joke at the proper time, but I do think that for the Prime Minister of England, under circumstances such as these, when throughout the whole country there is a painful sensation that we have not done justice to Ireland, and that Ireland is no credit to the Imperial Government, I think it is carrying hilarity and jocoseness a little too far to make an observation like that on so grave a subject. But if we come down to the seventy years during which this House has governed Ireland. we find things much in the same way. The pages of her history have been stained with tears and blood. There have still been restlessness and turbulence and insurrection appearing and re-appearing constantly on the records of her sad and dismal story. The right hon. Gentleman the late Secretary of State for the Home Department (Mr. Gathorne Hardy), who spoke last Session with a power which the House, I am sure, must have admired, and who spoke, I think, what he believed, referred to the Church in Ireland as the light of the Reformation; and he appeared not able to comprehend that this light of the Reformation, sustained by privilege, and fanned as it has been by the hot breath of faction, has been not so much a helpful light of the Reformation as a scorching fire which has burned up almost everything good and noble in the country, and industry and charity and peace and loyalty have perished in its flames. Now, Sir, I am for union as much as any Gentleman on that side of the House, but I am for a real union. I care nothing at all for the parchment nor for the Fifth Article. The parchment will decay and perish, and the words upon it will become illegible, and will be forgotten. The geographical position of these islands points out to every man that union is natural between them, and I maintain that a true and solid and just union between Ireland and Great Britain is infinitely better for both than any kind of severance can possibly be. But it must be a real union, not of power and weakness, and of weakness trampled on by power. Hon. Gentlemen opposite, and men who have discussed this Bill in the House and out of it, tell us that it appears here only as the result of what would be called in America "a Fenian scare," and that but for certain events which happened last year, and the year before, the policy of this Bill would not have been avowed by the present First Minister. ["Hear, hear."] Well, suppose it were true, it only adds another proof to the many going before it, that it is difficult with popular Government, and with party Government to make great and essential reforms unless under circumstances which force them absolutely upon the attention of Parliament. You know very well—

Mr. Bright

Irish Gentlemen know as well as English Gentlemen—that the Catholic Association led to Catholic emancipation. They know that the dethronement of the Bourbons, an event which took place in a foreign but neighbouring country, brought about the Reform Bill of 1832. They know—I know at any rate—that the desperate condition of affairs in the West Indies freed the slaves in the English colonies. We all know that the famine in Ireland came as an irresistible argument to bring about the repeal of the Corn Law. We know also that the mutiny in India drove the House immediately, and without further consideration, to abolish the East India Company, and to make an entire change in the government of India. And, Sir, if I were to come down to a later time, and speak of what took place in 1867, I might ask the right hon. Gentleman opposite and his Colleagues and his party what were the circumstances that induced them to be enthusiastic in support of a measure of household suffrage? It is a matter that we can but deplore, that it has required three years of the suspension of the Habeas Corpus Act in Ireland, and those other grievous events which have happened in Ireland and in England, to enable Parliament to undertake, and as I believe successfully, to carry through a policy which almost every enlightened and liberal Statesman in England for the last fifty years has hoped for, but feared he would not see. Then hon. Gentlemen tell us that discontent in America is also a very serious matter, as it causes Fenianism, which in turn has caused this Bill. We cannot deny that the existence of the disturbing cause in America is, unfortunate and irritating, but the theory of the Government is—it may be a mistake, but I believe it is not—that the remedy which will heal, in part or in whole, the disorders in Ireland, will heal much of the discontent of Irishmen everywhere. There is not an Irishman in the Australian colonies at this moment, there is not one on the continent of North America, who is not watching, as he reads the papers, the course of the English Parliament on this question; and unless his spirit has been maddened into that state of resistance when he will listen to no reason and to no fact he is feeling probably a softened disposition towards the Imperial Government and this House of Commons for the measure which we are now attempting to carry through Parliament. And with regard to America, this I think I may tell hon. Members opposite that the Fenian agitation in America has been fed, to a considerable extent, by a certain sympathy on the part of the people of the United States—I mean the natives of the States—who really do believe that we have never done justice to the native country of the Irishman. I believe that Irishmen will still emigrate when you have done what may be done this Session and the next. The right hon. Gentleman is apparently much afraid that something desperate is about to be done with regard to the land. At least, so far as I am concerned, he may rely on this, that nothing will be done with regard to the land which the principles of political economy will not support—and which everything that is moral and just in the conduct of political affairs may not fairly undertake. I say the great Republic will still invite, no doubt, vast numbers of the population of Ireland; but I believe they will go there no longer as enemies, and that the complaint, which Lord North made, so long ago as the first American War, will at length be put an end to, and England henceforth will not find her greatest enemies on the American continent to be those that have issued from the shores of the United Kingdom. Sir, I will not go into the details of this Bill, for this reason—that we are only upon the second reading of it; but so far as I have been able to gather of public opinion, the Bill meets the view of the public in this way—that it is whole and complete, that it deals fairly and justly with all who can claim any compensation under it. If there is anybody in Ireland, or any class, which has a right to complain, it surely must be the 4,000,000 or 4,500,000 of Roman Catholics. I think it will be felt by the House—whatever may be the opinion of any Member of the House—upon the question of the Catholic Church, that in this Bill the very least has been proposed as to compensation for Catholics and for their Church that it was possible for any just Government to propose. I do not suppose that I shall come within the range of the wishes of the right hon. and learned Member for the University of Dublin (Dr. Ball). His speech to-night has been generally a complaint that this Bill adopted the voluntary principle for Ireland; that the voluntary principle was bad; that what you should have done was to have increased the grant to Maynooth, to have elevated the condition of teaching there. In point of fact, that doctrine that was first avowed last Session, and then repudiated and denied, has been brought forward in a more daring manner to-night. The heaviest complaint almost against the Bill has been that it would establish the voluntary principle in Ireland, instead of establishing the Roman Catholic Church. And we are told of the desperate evils that will come when, instead of having one voluntary discontented Church, we shall have three. Surely the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Disraeli) and his learned Colleague (Dr. Ball) really cannot have supposed that the House would be taken in with anything so very small and so hollow as that? The Catholic Church in Ireland is not discontented because it is not endowed. It is discontented because another and a smaller Church—in numbers a comparatively insignificant Church—is established there, not by the power or consent of Irishmen, but by the power and will of the Imperial Parliament, and that to this very small and comparatively insignificant Church has been handed over all the ecclesiastical revenues which belonged in ancient times, and which now justly belong, to the whole of the Irish nation. But some hon. Gentlemen opposite have a great feeling for the congregations. So have I. I think the congregations have a right to excite the sympathy of Parliament. But I have seen other congregations, and how they emerged from their difficulties. In 1843, nearly 500 ministers in Scotland, not waiting for an Act of Parliament to disendow them, walked out of their manse. They left many charming residences, and many nice churches. They quitted homes in which they had spent many of the happiest years of their lives. They went out as a Church absolutely naked. There was not a church left for them, nor a glebe house, nor a curtilage, nor commutation; and, I will be bound to say, not a single good wish, or “God bless you,” from any man on that side of the House. Do not—do not tell the House that your Irish Protestant congregations are feebler and worse than the congregations in Scotland. What have they done since in Scotland? It is told in a sentence, though it would take weeks to survey it all. They have built 900 churches, not less than 650 manses for their ministers; they have built 500 schools, three theological Colleges, and two training institutions; and during the last three years—I have not the accounts further back—they have raised, on an average, by the voluntary subscriptions of their members, not less than £370,000 per annum; and during the twenty-five years that have elapsed since these 500 ministers walked out of the Established Church, their congregations have raised, by voluntary contributions, a sum exceeding £8,000,000 sterling. The right hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for Dublin University had the courage to say, in the presence of many members of Nonconformist bodies, that ministers of voluntary churches were rather a low class—that they were not so high-born as the very high-born clergy of the Establishment. As to being high-born, I think the Prophets of old were, many of them, graziers. The Apostles were fishermen and handicraftsmen; and their religion was one to which “not many mighty, not many noble” were called. It may be that in this age and in this country the light of the Reformation and the light of Christianity may be carried through the land by men of humble birth with just as much success as may attend men who were born in great mansions or in palaces. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Buckinghamshire argued very much in favour of an Established Church, on the ground that there ought to be some place into which people could get who would not readily be admitted anywhere else. What the right hon. Gentleman wants is this, that you should have an Established Church which has no discipline, and that anybody who will live up to what may be called a gentlemanly conformity to it may pass through the world as a very satisfactory sort of a Christian. Sir, these are arguments that I should be ashamed to use. If I were a Churchman I would either find better arguments or I would keep silence. And I believe, if I were forced to keep silence, I should be obliged to give up the belief that the Church was much better than the Nonconformist bodies. My opinion is that you do great injustice to the Protestants of Ireland. Is there any reason why, for example, the

Scotchmen in the North of Ireland—the Presbyterians—should be less liberal or energetic than their countrymen of the Free Church in Scotland? And why should the Episcopalian Protestants in Ireland, when freed from the trammels of the State, be less active and successful than their neighbours, the Presbyterians, and their co-religionists the Presbyterians of Scotland? I believe that your sickly offspring of privilege and favouritism may become the robust champion of the light of the Reformation; and perhaps we may live to see the day when the right hon. Gentleman will make a recantation at this table. The Earl of Aberdeen, who was only a few years ago Prime Minister of this country, told me in 1856, at his house in Scotland, that no public event connected with Scotland had, during his long life, given him so much pain as the separation in the Church of Scotland—and that he had lived long enough to see that all his lamentations and fears were vain, and that it had been one of the very happiest events that had ever come to his country. He spoke of the Church, he spoke of the schools, and he said there was a great additional life spread throughout the whole people. If that should take place in Ireland, then the light of the Reformation, which now glimmers so faintly that no man can see it, may become a light shining over much of that island; and to those who think it important it may be satisfactory to hope that Catholicism, in its extreme and Roman sense, may give place to a more liberal religion, and approximate nearer to that which we think better—namely, the faith and religion of the Protestant Churches. It is too late to-night to go into the question of the surplus. There is one thing that I should say about it—and I say it in the hearing of my hon. and learned Friend (Sir Roundell Palmer), who is understood to take a different view of this question from some on this side—John Wycliffe, as the House knows, lived 500 years ago. He was born in the town of Richmond, and he was, perhaps, the first and greatest of the English Reformers. John Wycliffe was obliged to consider this question—as to what should be done with regard to religious endowments; and he said—“If Churches make bad use of their endowments princes are bound to take them away from them.”

It is not too much for us to say that if endowments are found to be mischievous Parliament may put them to other uses. I sometimes wonder how it is that in 500 years we make so little progress on some subjects. That was the opinion of Wycliffe in the 14th century, and we are now discussing the same subject in this House; and right hon. hon. and learned Gentlemen get up in this House and denounce as almost sacrilege and spoliation any attempt on the part of the Imperial Parliament to deal with the endowments of the State Church in Ireland. And as to the uses to which these endowments are put. If I were particular on the point as to the sacred nature of the endowments, I should even then be satisfied with the propositions in this Bill—for, after all, I hope it is not far from Christianity to charity; and we know that the Divine Founder of our faith has left much more of the doings of a compassionate and loving heart than He has of dogma. I am not able to give the chapter, or the verse, the page, or the column; but what has always struck me most in reading the narratives of the Gospel is how much of kindness and how much of compassion there was, and how much also there was of dealing kindly with all that were sick, with all that were suffering. Do you think it will be a misappropriation of the surplus funds of this great Establishment to apply them to some objects such as those described in the Bill? Do you not think that from the charitable dealing with these matters even a sweeter incense may arise than when these vast funds are applied to maintain three times the number of clergy that can be of the slightest use to the Church with which they are connected. We can do but little, it is true. We cannot relume the extinguished lamp of reason. We cannot make the deaf to hear. We cannot make the dumb to speak. It is not given to us—

“From the thick film to purge the visual ray,
And on the sightless eyeballs pour the day.”

But at least we can lessen the load of affliction, and we can make life more tolerable to vast numbers who suffer. Sir, when I look at this great measure—and I can assure the House I have looked at it much more than the majority of hon. and right hon. Members opposite, because I have seen it grow from line to line, and from clause to clause, and have watched its growth and its completion with a great and increasing interest—I say when I look at this measure I look on it as tending to a more true and solid union between Ireland and Great Britain; I see it giving tranquillity to our people; [“Oh, oh!”]—when you have a better remedy I at least will fairly consider it—I say I see this measure giving tranquillity to our people, greater strength to the realm, and adding a new lustre and a new dignity to the Crown. I dare claim then for this Bill the support of all thoughtful and good people within the bounds of the British Empire, and I cannot doubt that in its early and great results it will have the blessing of the Supreme, for I believe it to be founded on those principles of justice and mercy which are the glorious attributes of His eternal reign.

Order for Second Reading read.

MR. AYRTON said, there would be no objection to the Bill passing that stage if it were understood that it must be materially altered in Committee by striking out a clause which provided that the Treasury should give compensation to some gentlemen who performed local functions. He would suggest that the hon. Member in charge of the Bill should communicate with the hon. Member for Durham, and arrange with him what was to be done.

MR. BENTINCK said, he should be glad to do so, and to take the second reading on the understanding mentioned.

Bill read a second time, and committed for Monday next.

POSTAL—BOOK POST &c.—QUESTION.

MR. MACFIE said, he would beg to ask the Postmaster General, What are the reasons why the advantage of being conveyed by the Book Post is limited to printed and such-like matter; of what nature are the obstacles that stand in the way of a properly guarded removal of the present limitation; whether the Evening Mails for England are despatched from the Metropolis at about the same hour as in the era of Stage Coaches; whether there would not arise much public benefit from despatching these Mails at a later hour; what are the reasons why that benefit has not yet been conferred; and, whether he has any hope of being able to favour the Nation with the concessions that form the subject of the foregoing Questions?

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON: The reason, Sir, why the book post and pattern post rates have not been extended to parcels is, I believe, that those rates have not been found sufficiently remunerative to justify their further extension. This obstacle, of course, still stands in the way of the removal of the present limitation. I believe, however, there also other obstacles. One of the principal is, that if the Post Office were to encumber itself with the conveyance of a much larger quantity of heavy matter than it does now, it is probable that the chief object of the Post Office—namely, the rapid and certain delivery of letters—would be very injuriously interfered with. With regard to the other evening mails are despatched about the same hour as they used to be in the time of mail coaches, but it ought to be remembered that under the present system letters are delivered much earlier all over the country than they were formerly. The Post Office, I may mention, takes the opportunity whenever a later train is despatched of sending a bag by that train, but I do not think that there would be any general advantage in altering the hours at which the mails are despatched. It was obviously impossible, for financial reasons, to run trains at a late hour in the evening solely for Post Office purposes.

GREECE—BRITISH PAYMENTS TO.

QUESTION.

MR. KIRK said, he would beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury, If it is true that a sum of £1,139,198, according to a Parliamentary Return dated the 20th of February last, has been paid by England to Greece since the year 1843 to the present time; and, whether these sums have been paid in accordance with any Treaty, Convention, or Contract between England and Greece; if so, what were the political objects sought for by the British Government at the period when such Treaty, Convention, or Contract was concluded between this Country and Greece, and have these objects been attained; if not, are Her Majesty's Government prepared to recommend to Parliament the further payment of such moneys for an indefinite period, or are they prepared to signify to the Hellenic Government that after a certain period no further sums of Money will be paid by England to Greece?

MR. GLADSTONE: Sir, the matter of fact which enters into the Question of my hon. Friend is very easily answered. It is true that a sum of £1,139,198 has been paid by England since the year 1843 up to the present time, and that it has been paid to Greece in the sense of being paid in order to prevent defalcation in the regular dividends on a certain portion of a Loan on behalf of Greece, which Loan was contracted under our guarantee. It has not been paid to Greece, therefore, for her own disposal or to use it at her own discretion, but in fulfilment of an engagement into which this country has entered. Next, it is a fact that the whole of these sums have been paid in accordance with treaties, conventions, and contracts; and not only so, but in accordance with treaties, conventions, and contracts, which from their nature were brought under the notice of Parliament, and which received the sanction of Parliament. Indeed, without such sanction these sums could not have been paid even if Her Majesty had pledged herself to the payment. The political object sought by the British Government in connection with other Powers, especially France and Russia, was the establishment and security of the liberty and independence of the Kingdom of Greece. The degree in which that object has been attained is, of course, a matter on which there can be no difference of opinion, but before the present King of Greece assumed the Throne, a new Convention was entered into, and it was then declared by these Powers to be for the interest of Europe that the Greek Kingdom should continue to exist in a state of political independence. At that time, also, a certain sacrifice was made by this country, which engaged to give up the dividends which the Greek Government would have to pay to us in consideration of a certain regulated sum of £12,000 a year. That arrangement received the sanction of Parliament. With regard to the last portion of the question of the hon. Gentleman as to whether the Government are prepared to recommend to Parliament the further payment of such moneys for an indefinite period, I am afraid I have no option but to say that it is, under covenant, absolutely the bounden duty of this country to continue to pay these moneys until either the loan is liquidated, or we can prevail on the Government of Greece to make provision for the payment. In 1860, when the regulated payment of £12,000 from Greece was agreed upon, that sum was not accepted as a permanent arrangement, but as the minimum sum that Greece was to pay. It was fully understood that, in proportion as her resources and financial condition might improve, the Powers would be at liberty to require of Greece the further, and, if possible, the complete, carrying out of her engagements.

UNIVERSITY OF DURHAM.—QUESTION.

MR. STEVENSON said, he wished to ask Mr. Solicitor General, Whether he is willing to make provision in the University Tests Bill to extend the benefits of that measure to the University of Durham?

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL replied, that as far as he was concerned, he did not propose to introduce clauses into the University Tests Bill to extend its provisions to the University of Durham. He confessed he was not acquainted with the precise constitution of the University of Durham. Of course he should not offer any obstacle to any hon. Gentleman proposing such clause or clauses if he thought fit to do so. Indeed, as far as he was concerned, he had not the smallest objection to the Bill being so extended.

IRELAND—NATIONAL EDUCATION.

QUESTION.

MR. KEOWN said, he wished to ask the Chief Secretary for Ireland, If he can give any information as to the time when the Report of the Royal Commission to inquire into the system of National Education in Ireland is likely to be forthcoming?

MR. CHICHESTER FORTESCUE said, in reply, that the Royal Commissioners were anxious that the Commission should be prolonged until March of next year, this extension of time being necessary, they considered, in order finally to wind up the proceedings of the Commission; but upon the application of the Government the Commissioners had signified their full expectation that they would be able to supply their Report before the end of the present year.

METROPOLITAN RAILWAY—PALACE-YARD STATION.—QUESTION.

MR. HERBERT said, he wished to ask the First Commissioner of Work, When the passage leading from Palace Yard to the Station of the Metropolitan Railway is to be opened?

MR. LAYARD, in reply, said, he had hoped the passage would have been opened before the present time. There had, however, been some delay with respect to underground works connected with the sewers and gas, which had to be removed. The work had now been commenced, and he had been assured by the architect that it would be completed within four months.

DISTRICT ASYLUMS—QUESTION.

MR. W. H. SMITH said, he wished to ask the President of the Poor Law Board, If the amounts of £56,600 and £44,000 respectively, specified in the Returns relating to Asylums (Metropolis) as the estimated cost of the structures of the Fever and Small Pox Asylums at Stockwell and Homerton, include all charges necessary to the completion and fitting of the Asylums for the reception of patients; and, if not, the estimated additional amount which will be required for that purpose; and, if he will state the number of beds to be provided in the proposed new hospitals for the chronic sick, bedridden, and acute sick in each of the Sick Asylum Districts of Newington, Kensington, Rotherhithe, Poplar, Central London, and Finsbury?

MR. GOSCHEN said, in reply, that the sums specified in the Returns to which the hon. Gentleman's first Question related did not include the amount paid for furniture and things. His hon. Friend the Member for Finsbury (Mr. M'Cullagh Torrens) had moved for a Return showing the cost of the site and the cost of the structures. The Poor Law Board had applied to the managers of the Metropolitan Asylum District for the estimate, as asked for, and they gave the original estimate for the structures. It was stated in the Returns that these estimates were subject to material alterations which were under consideration, and which would effect a reduction. That reduction, in the case of the Stockwell Asylum, had now been settled, and was ascertained to amount to £5,600. But, on the other hand, the estimates for fixings, furniture, and fittings had since come in, subsequent, he should add, to the publication of the Return, and the Poor Law Board was not in possession of the information which the estimates furnished when the Returns were asked for, nor had the Board yet had the opportunity of examining the items, so that the estimates for furniture and fixtures must as yet be regarded as simply provisional. They amounted to about £16,000, besides a sum of £6,700, which represented 10 per cent for possible contingencies. The hon. Member would understand that those amounts could only provisionally be accepted as correct, and that the figures which he had mentioned applied to the Stockwell Asylum, and not to the Homerton, of which he had not yet received any estimates beyond the cost of structure given in the Return. With respect to the second Question, the hon. Member, who was himself a member of the Metropolitan Asylums Board, might possibly be aware that a different arrangement would be carried out in the case of Finsbury to that originally contemplated. The same remark applied more or less to the cases of Newington and Rotherhithe, which were under the consideration of the Board, and they might possibly be dealt with also in a different manner. With regard to the number of beds originally proposed, they were as follows—and he might observe that the estimates for the number of beds were those of the managers of the Asylums, and not of the Poor Law Board, though the inspector had conferred with the managers. The number of beds at Newington was about 600, at Kensington 600, at Rotherhithe 500, at Poplar 570, and in Central London probably about 600. These were entirely provisional estimates, with regard to which no decision had at all been taken, and with respect to which he hoped to be able to make a statement when the Bill to amend the Metropolitan Poor Bill of 1867 came on for discussion.

POSTAL—STORNOWAY.—QUESTION.

MR. GRIEVE said, he would beg to ask the Postmaster General, Whether, having reference to a Memorial from the inhabitants of Stornoway, dated 1st of January, 1867, to his Lordship's predecessor in Office, and one from the Chamber of Commerce at Wick, dated February last, to his Lordship, praying for proper postal accommodation—namely, "A daily steamer in summer and thrice a week in winter, as in the case of the Orkneys"—is to be carried into effect; and whether the Inhabitants of Stornoway have offered to his Lordship to pay the sum required to make up their postal revenue to the same amount as that of the Orkneys, at the period of their obtaining the mail steamer to Thurso, or an alternative proposal of £500 a year for three years, in part of the expense of a mail steamer between Ullapool and Stornoway?

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON replied that the cost of the present postal service to the island of Lewis and the expense connected with the Post Office in the island itself already absorbed the whole of the postal revenue derived from it. Any additional postal facilities, therefore, which might be given would cause considerable loss to the general revenue of the Department. It was therefore not, under these circumstances, his intention to recommend that "a daily steamer in summer and thrice a week in winter" should be subsidized by the Government. He believed it was true that the inhabitants of Stornoway had made the proposal referred to by the hon. Gentleman in the latter part of his Question, but he could not admit that there was any analogy between the case of the Orkneys and Stornoway, because the distance in the latter case was much greater, and the expense would, as a consequence, be much heavier. He had only to add that there was no intention on the part of the Post Office to make any alteration such as that which the hon. Gentleman suggested.

BIRMINGHAM BOARD OF GUARDIANS. QUESTION.

MR. DIXON said, he would beg to ask the President of the Poor Law Board, Whether his attention has been called to the following facts—namely, that on the 16th instant, the Chairman and four other members of the Birmingham Board of Guardians were summoned by the District Poor Law Auditor for a surcharge of £8, and ordered to pay the amount, that sum being the cost of conveying Sarah Simpson and her eight children to Liverpool, in order that they might be shipped thence to the United States, the husband, who was living there, having paid the passage money; that the Board of Guardians passed a resolution requesting their Chairman not to pay the surcharge, and that the Poor Law Board was appealed to, but declined to sanction the payment of the £8 by the Board; and, whether, if the alleged facts are true, the President of the Poor Law Board will state the grounds on which the appeal was refused, and a surcharge ordered to be made?

MR. GOSCHEN, in reply, said, his attention had been called to the facts mentioned in the hon. Gentleman's Question through the usual channels of information, as well as by the hon. Member himself and his right hon. Colleague in the representation of Birmingham. The facts in themselves were correctly stated, although being placed not in a proper order they were calculated to give an erroneous impression of the transactions referred to. No appeal had been made to the Poor Law Board since the summons had been issued, and there had been no correspondence on the matter since January, beyond a letter written to the district auditor, asking whether the sum referred to had been paid. The case, he might add, was not a new one, for the £8 had been spent as far back as August, 1867. There was, also, one fact which was not mentioned in the enumeration of facts contained in the Question, and which was most material. The fact to which he alluded was that the guardians asked, in the first instance, whether the Poor Law Board would sanction the payment. The Board replied that it would be contrary to the regulations to do so, but the guardians, nevertheless, after that information, chose to incur the responsibility. He would presently state why it was that the Poor Law Board had refused their sanction in the matter; but he should first say that the Order refusing the surcharge was issued on the 14th of December, two days before he took charge of the Department. A letter had since been received from the guardians asking for re-consideration. The opinion of counsel had been taken on a previous occasion, upon the question whether such Orders could be rescinded, and that opinion was in the negative. They were in the nature of judicial decisions. The matter, therefore, had been finally closed when he came into Office. He had been asked on what grounds the Poor Law Board refused to remit the surcharge. The grounds were that the United States had expressed dissatisfaction at having paupers sent there, as he had once before stated to the House. There were remonstrances on the subject, and the Poor Law Board were, therefore, obliged to establish the regulation which had given such offence to the guardians. It was not the policy of the Board to oppose emigration in the least, but they had found it necessary to make the regulation in question. He himself was most anxious to modify it if it could be done. The Guardians, he hoped, would not continue their protest against the Order, which he trusted, after this explanation, they would feel to be unnecessary.

COMMUNICATION BETWEEN RAILWAY PASSENGERS AND GUARD.

QUESTION.

MR. H. B. SHERIDAN said, he wished to ask the President of the Board of Trade, Whether any uniform system has been agreed upon between the Railways and the Board of Trade for giving effect to the Act of last Session requiring that a means of communication should be provided between the Passenger and Guard of Railway trains?

MR. BRIGHT: Some weeks ago, Sir, the representatives of the principal railway companies north of London called at the Board of Trade. They were a very important deputation, and recommended a mode of communication between the drivers and the guards, and between the passengers and both. After having examined it, and hearing the statements of the deputation, the Board of Trade sanctioned the application of that system to those railway companies. It is known as the rope system, and is a very simple, and, I hope, effective means of communication. Upon the South-Eastern, which does not run trains in connection with any of the northern lines, another system—the electric system—has been adopted, and sanctioned by the Board of Trade. But if railway companies run carriages on lines where the rope system is adopted, it will be necessary, I presume that the rope system should also be adopted by them. The Board of Trade has not sanctioned this system irrevocably, but has allowed it to be fairly tried, and it is my hope and opinion that in all probability it will be found quite effective, and that no change of system will be necessary. If, however, after trial, it should be found ineffective, the Board of Trade will be at liberty to recommend any other system which may be found more efficient.

Mr. Goschen

IRELAND—FENIAN CONSPIRACY.

QUESTION.

COLONEL ANNESLEY said, he rose to ask the Chief Secretary for Ireland, Whether it is true that, on the 22nd of February last, a man, named Smith, was arrested in the county of Cavan, for having in his possession Fenian documents and resolutions, regularly printed on green paper, and containing plans and schemes of the Fenian conspiracy, dated 1869; and, whether it is the intention of Her Majesty's Government to recommend the liberation of any more Fenian convicts? He hoped the right hon. Gentleman would be able to give a distinct answer to the latter part of the Question.

MR. CHICHESTER FORTESCUE: It is true, Sir, that a man named Smith was apprehended upon the date mentioned, and that what were apparently Fenian documents were found in his possession, one of them being printed upon green paper. This person has been committed for trial. With regard to the second part of the Question of the hon. and gallant Member, I am not able to add anything to what I said when a Question was last asked upon this subject—namely, that it was not the intention of the Government to offer any further advice to the Crown on that subject.

SCOTLAND—EDUCATION.—QUESTION.

SIR EDWARD COLEBROOKE said, he wished to ask the Lord Advocate, Whether the Government will lay before Parliament their proposal for the future distribution of the annual Grants for Education in Scotland under the Rules of the Privy Council, or by any other authority, before their Measure relating to the Schools of Scotland is brought before the House?

THE LORD ADVOCATE said, in reply, that in the Bill which was before the other House of Parliament there was a Schedule announcing generally the principles upon which the rules of the Privy Council were to be made applicable in Scotland. Until, however, that Bill became law it was impossible that these rules could be finally adjusted, and, therefore, it would be impossible as yet to lay before Parliament the final proposals upon this subject. But as the matter excited a good deal of interest in Scotland—and it was well that there should be no misunderstanding as to the proposals of the Government in the event of the Bill substantially becoming law—he had to state for the information of the House, that in adjusting the Rules of the Committee of the Privy Council to be applied to Scotland, the Government proposed to adopt the principle of payment for results on the following conditions, which were adapted to the system long established in that country, of supporting schools by local rates, and which would be carried out, provided the system of rating be extended so as to meet the full demands of national education—First, that no distinction should be made in the payments from the Committee of Council in consideration of the class of society to which the parents of children attending school belonged. He believed that, as a general rule, the children of all classes in Scotland mixed freely in the schools. The second condition was that the principle which was partially adopted in the Minute of the late Vice President of the Council (Mr. Corry) should receive a more extended application in Scotland, and that, up to the age of sixteen, children might be examined on subjects higher than Standard Six of the Revised Code. But, third, that the above Rule relative to the higher branches should be limited to landward parishes; and, fourth, that no payment in respect of higher subjects should be made unless the average number of the scholars attending any school should have reached a specified standard in elementary branches.

INCLOSURE OF LANDS BILL.

QUESTION.

In reply to Mr. T. CHAMBERS,
MR. KNATCHBULL-HUGESSEN said, that owing to the opposition which had arisen to the inclosure of Wisley Common, in Surrey, he should not think it right to press this Bill at a late hour of the night; but, as it would be obviously unfair to stop the inclosures which were unopposed, he should omit Wisley from the Schedule, and a full inquiry would be instituted, probably by means of a Committee, before any steps were taken to enclose that common.

IRISH CHURCH BILL—[BILL 27.]

(Mr. Dodson, Mr. Gladstone, Mr. John Bright,
Mr. Chichester Fortescue, Mr. Attorney General for Ireland.)

SECOND READING. ADJOURNED DEBATE.

[THIRD NIGHT.]

Order read, for resuming Adjourned Debate on Amendment proposed to Question [18th March], "That the Bill be now read a second time;" and which Amendment was, to leave out the word "now," and at the end of the Question to add the words "upon this day six months."—(Mr. Disraeli.)

Question again proposed, "That the word 'now' stand part of the Question."

Debate resumed.

SIR ROUNDELL PALMER: * Mr. SPEAKER, I do not think it is possible that there can be any Member of this House to whom this measure has been the occasion of greater anxiety and solicitude than it has been to myself. Almost all the motives which most powerfully actuate and influence human nature would lead me to be desirous of giving my support to the Bill proposed by my right hon. Friend at the head of the Government. If general agreement of political opinion were sufficient for that purpose, I may say that there is no man whom for many years past I have so much wished to see occupying the position which my right hon. Friend now fills; and having for nearly nine years been acting in close and cordial co-operation with the party who occupy the Benches on this side of the House, I am bound to say that nothing has occurred during that time which has made me otherwise than proud of and satisfied with that connection, and full of sympathy for the high and patriotic aims which I know to actuate that party in general, and full of personal respect for all the Members of it with whom I have been brought into immediate contact. If personal attachments, if a sense of the highest personal and political obligations could be enough to determine any man's course upon this occasion, there are no attachments of mine stronger than those which I bear to some of my Friends sitting on the Bench below me; and from the first time that I became connected with them until now nothing has been omitted which could possibly have been done to make me more and more deeply indebted to them for every sort of consideration and kindness. The House will therefore believe that if I am unable to go with them upon this question, it is only under a sense of imperious and overwhelming necessity. My difficulty is not diminished because there are points on which I certainly cannot profess to differ from the advocates of this measure. I have no sympathy whatever with those who impugn the motives either of my right hon. Friend at the head of the Government, or of any of those associated with him in this undertaking. I know their motives to be as pure, I know them to be as completely reconcilable in their minds with a just regard to the interests of religion as my own, or as those of any other man; and I hope that in expressing, as I mean to do with freedom, my own opinions upon this subject, I shall not be betrayed into a single word which can for a moment cast the slightest reflection upon their intentions or motives. Furthermore, I cannot shut my eyes to the fact that there is a real crisis in Ireland; a crisis to my mind the more grave and the more serious for the very reason that Ireland has been improving for many years in its condition; for the very reason that the Legislature of this country has shown so much anxious care to make the union with Ireland a real and hearty union. These circumstances, instead of producing a political reconciliation between the majority of the people of Ireland and the people of this country, seem only to make things worse, and I cannot but think we are called upon, more than at any previous period, deeply to consider the causes of this evil, and discover, if we can, a remedy for those causes. I agree with what was so eloquently said by the President of the Board of Trade, that we ought, if we can, discovering that remedy, to lay aside all party considerations whatever, and be willing to make any sacrifice—be it merely a sacrifice of interest, of prejudice, of feeling, not of duty—which would meet so grievous a state of things; and even upon the point of the disestablishment of the Church, I shall presently show that there is a certain length to which I might be able myself to go in company with my right hon. Friend.

Sir Roundell Palmer

When I look at this Bill, I cannot conceal from myself that the principle of it is not disestablishment simply in the sense in which I use that term, but disestablishment accompanied by universal disendowment. That is a principle to which I cannot agree. It is advocated as an act of justice. To my mind it is a great act of injustice. It is advocated as likely to have salutary and beneficial consequences. I confess that I apprehend from it consequences which may tend to destroy the salutary effect of those parts of the measure, from which I might otherwise have anticipated good results. It is my duty to inform the House how far I am able to go with the Government on this point of disestablishment. I mean by disestablishment the severance of direct political relations between the institutions of the Church and the laws and government of the State. Taking it in that sense, and carefully separating the question of disendowment from disestablishment, I must say I cannot agree with those who say that the severance of the political relations of the Church with the State is, and necessarily must be, an abnegation of national Christianity, or an act of national apostacy. It appears to me that such a view is founded on an entirely false notion of the vocation of civil government and of the nature of national religion. The duty of civil government is to govern all and every part of the country committed to its charge with impartiality and justice, and with a regard to those interests which it belongs to human laws to protect. National religion, as I understand it, is not any profession, embodied in laws, or forms and ceremonies, made by those who are at the head of the Government; but it is the religion of the people who constitute the nation. It may be, and must naturally be under many states of circumstances, that the religious convictions of the people will express themselves in the forms and institutions of their Government. Under all circumstances, they must exercise a great influence over public legislation; and if the rulers are religious men, whether as members of a legislative body like this House, or as administering public authority in any other way, they will carry with them their religion, and be controlled or guided by its moral influence, in the discharge of all parts of their duty. But the forms of national institutions do and must, in this as in all other respects, vary from time to time, according to the circumstances of the country; and it is impossible to lay down a priori a rule to decide whether this change or that change tends to a departure from the national religion. Every single individual will be in point of religion what he was before the change, and therefore unless you believe that those who advocate the change have themselves departed from the principles of their religious profession, it is a monstrous and self-calumniating thing to say that an act of the nature now under consideration is an act of national apostacy. These views receive confirmation when they are examined by the light of history. In reality nothing has more changed and fluctuated in form and almost in substance than this idea of Establishment, as applied to the Church in this country, and to the institutions of the State in relation to the Church. The idea of Establishment at this day is different from what it was in the time of Elizabeth and Mary, and down to the time of the Revolution in 1688. It then meant that the Church and its doctrines were by the law of this country incorporated with the laws of the realm, and every person was presumed and commanded by law to be a member of that Church; and he was punished by the temporal law if he did not discharge the duties belonging to a member of the Church. That is a totally different sort of Establishment from any now existing in this country. There were, doubtless, persons who, when the Toleration Laws were first introduced, thought that we were giving up national Christianity because we did not any longer compel every citizen to profess the faith of the Church, which had been until then identified with the State. Do we not know, with respect to the Penal Laws, which all of us now condemn, that there were men who looked on every one of them as a badge and mark of national Christianity, and fancied that if we removed them we should shake the foundations of the faith? Do we forget how our metropolis was agitated in the last century, when propositions were made for the mitigation of those Penal Laws, and how it was said that if those propositions should be successful the light of Protestantism would be extinguished? It is well known that many persons declared, when the Roman Catholics were first admitted to political power, that the extension of that privilege to them amounted to a giving up of national Christianity. The same thing was said when we admitted the Jews to this House. But have we been—I speak of the nation as a whole—less Protestant or less Christian since? Those who are Roman Catholics now—still speaking generally—were Roman Catholics then; those who are Jews now were Jews then; the religion of the people is the same, not having in any way altered. These adjustments of institutions to the necessities of civil government, as time went on, simply tended to make the Government a more true and faithful representative of the social condition and actual state of the people; and the exclusion of any classes of persons from their fair share of political power, on the ground that they do not belong to a dominant Church, is no longer recognized as being good either for the State or for the Church. Therefore we must approach the question of any political privilege given to the Church by considering whether the privilege is for the public good; for if it be not I am sure it is not likely to be for the good of religion; and, if it were good for religion, it would doubtless be for the public advantage. In the case of Ireland, I ask myself whether there are or are not valid reasons of State for the existence of that political privilege which constitutes an Establishment, and which may or may not be of utility to the Church. I confess I am at a loss to see in what point of view the political privilege of which I speak is at present useful for the spiritual objects of the Irish Church. We are bound to inquire—first, whether there is or is not reasonable ground for believing that this political privilege of the Protestant Episcopal Church is one of the causes of disaffection among the great body of the Irish people; and, secondly, whether it can be justly maintained for reasons higher and more important than those which are put forward to justify its removal. The hon. Member for Hertfordshire, in moving the Address to the Crown on the first day of the Session, said that what some people call sentimental grievances are calculated by their nature to excite most substantial irritation. There is real truth in that observation. The same feelings which prompt men to make great sacrifices for political freedom, or for national honour, are excited to resist any form of political ascendancy, which is created and maintained by external power in favour of any class, who, if that external power were removed, would have no moral right to claim it. The case is not as if there were one Church Establishment for the whole United Kingdom—Scotland is, for this purpose, separately considered; and it is natural that Ireland should claim to be so too. But then, if the grievance consists in a violation of the national sentiment, what ought to be the remedy? Why should the remedy go beyond the disease? If the grievance is political ascendancy, surely the removal of political ascendancy will be the sufficient remedy. The grievance consists in giving, by State Establishment, to the Church of a small minority of the Irish people a superiority of rank, and an exclusive right—a right which no other religious body in the country possesses—to have its laws deemed part of the laws of the land, to have courts maintained for the execution of those laws—in the association of the Sovereign with the appointment of its chief officers, like the great officers of State—and in the introduction of those chief officers into the highest seats in one of the two Houses of the Legislature. These are the signs and marks of political ascendancy, these are the political privileges, these are the things that cause this rankling and irritation of feeling; and, in my humble judgment, the exigency of the case, this so-called sentimental grievance, may be met by the corresponding remedy—by the removal of those distinctions which elevate factitiously the political position of this particular Church above the other religious bodies in the country. But the question, whether you will take away their property seems to me an entirely different thing.

I come, then, to that question; and I ask whether, if you concede what I have conceded—if you do what I have stated myself willing to acquiesce in—although, of course, it would be with reluctance that, belonging to the Church of England, so long associated with the Church of Ireland, I could see anything like an apparent diminution of the honour and dignity of the Church, to which I am deeply attached—yet, conceding what I have conceded, I ask, is it really a necessary consequence of it, that you are to introduce and pass this measure of universal disendowment? I will try and limit myself to the use of the word “disendowment.” It means the same thing with another word, “confiscation,” which I have been quoted in this debate as using elsewhere, but which I did not use as a word of contumely. As I take it, that word properly means taking property not at present rightfully in the coffers or treasury of the State, and putting it there. It is not to be denied that there are occasions and causes which might justify acts properly described by the word “confiscation.” The question is, whether this is such a case. I confess I think not. I turn, then, to the question, is this universal disendowment a necessary consequence of taking away political ascendancy and political privilege? As a fact, it may possibly now have become so; but if so, who made it necessary? I do not think that such a necessity would be inherent in the nature of the change. I cannot be persuaded that it is a necessity arising from the justice of the case. It may have now become a political necessity; but I can take no part in the responsibility unless I think it always was so, and is also just. I will first ask whether any kind of precedent can be found for it? I confess I know of none. It appears to me unparalleled even by the extensive appropriations of Church property at the time of the Reformation in this country, appropriations which, I suppose, no one will deny, were attended or followed by very serious evils, and which few people have entirely sympathized with, though they may be thought to be politically necessary. These appropriations were of property belonging to institutions which it was deliberately thought should cease, not merely as then established, but should altogether cease to exist—institutions which were thought practical evils in themselves, and which it was considered the interest, if not the duty, of the State altogether to suppress. Had that been the view taken of the present Church of Ireland, of course we might have admitted the parallel, although we might not agree with the opinion. But every line of this Bill—which from the point of view in which it has been conceived displays the most anxious desire to do as much justice as possible consistently with that view—every line bears witness to the fact, that it is not thought that the Protestant Episcopal Church in Ireland ought to be suppressed, or can or will cease to exist. We have, therefore, no parallel, even in the extensive appropriations of Church property which occurred in this country at the time of the Reformation; nor am I aware of any parallel cases in any other country, although in some other countries these appropriations have taken place under circumstances so revolutionary as to form no precedents at all. Has anything like this happened in Canada? In Canada, as was well pointed out by the right hon. and learned Member for the University of Dublin, in that remarkable speech, to which we all listened with so much satisfaction on Friday night—in Canada the whole case was essentially different. There were certain lands reserved by Act of Parliament which were originally supposed to belong to the Protestant Episcopal Church, and it was afterwards determined by law that, according to the true construction of the Act of Parliament, they belonged equally to all Protestant denominations. A large part of these lands had never become profitable; the income arising from other parts, which had never been assigned or appropriated as endowments to any particular rectories or parishes, had been distributed among the Episcopal clergy. These, when the reserves were resumed by the State, were dealt with very much in the way proposed by this Bill—that is, all persons who had got the benefit of the distribution previously made of the income had their life interests respected; they were commuted; and, as this portion of the reserves had not been appropriated for the use of any local communities, so as to give them any vested interests in their continuance, there was nothing else to take care of. But there was a third class of lands which had been actually appropriated to the endowment of particular rectories—I think between thirty and forty, or more, as was stated on Friday evening. These lands were appropriated to particular rectories of the Church of England, exactly in the manner in which tithes and glebe lands are now appropriated to the purposes of the Irish Church. What was done with them? Were they taken away? No. They were respected; they were left.

It was felt there was no way of compensating those vested interests, except by leaving the Churchmen of those parishes in the possession of the property; and they are in possession of it to this day. But what happened in the United States of America? Surely, if there ever was a case in which this principle of universal disendowment might have been naturally expected to be applied, it was in the case of the separation of the United States from the mother country. In some of the colonies something like ascendancy had been given to the Church of England. In the great State of New York there were Royal grants—not very old, the latest not much more than 150 years from the time I am now speaking; very valuable land in the City of New York had been granted for the endowment of Trinity episcopal church. We know, on that great Revolution, the great Republic did not think it its Christian duty to establish any particular Church or religious denomination—it was not, I apprehend, less religious on that account it is only evidence that there was in that great country a divided state of religion which made it inconsistent with civil harmony to introduce such an institution. But did they on that account; think it necessary to confiscate and take away the endowments granted to particular Protestant Episcopal churches, though granted by the Kings and the State of England in the previous times? They did not. It happened, not very recently, that a question arose before one of the courts of the United States as to the endowment to which I have referred. According to one account which I have received the value of that endowment is now about £400,000 a year—not so very far from the total value of the endowments of the Irish Church. [A voice from the Treasury Bench: “$400,000.”] No, the sum was reduced from dollars to pounds in the statement I have received. In another statement, however, the value was given at £100,000, but, by the falling in of leases, it was thought likely soon to reach or exceed the larger sum I have named. The question was raised, whether Trinity Church was entitled by the laws of the United States to the benefit of that endowment; or was it to be dealt with as national property, disposable by the nation? It was held

that no law to take it away had been passed by the United States, and till such a law had been passed it could not be so treated. Till you make such a law it is not national property, or to be treated as national property. But what is the key-note of this whole debate? Why, that this is national property now; not that we are now to make it so, but that we are to take it as being already so, to treat it as already in our pockets as a reason for putting it there. I would ask the House further, is there nothing in the nature of public endowments in any of our own colonies and foreign possessions where there is no Established Church? There are such endowments, as all who are acquainted with the colonies know. I am not sure how it is in India, but certainly in several of our colonies there are such endowments, although no Established Church. The questions of disendowment and of disestablishment, therefore, are not inseparable, and they ought not to be so treated. Whatever other reason can be given for so treating them, it is not a case of necessity. Granting that, I will now ask whether, although it is not necessary, it is right? Upon that question I think that the burden of proof—and much more proof than I have yet heard addressed to that part of the question—lies upon those who insert it. However, I will do my best to accept that burden myself, and I will inquire whether there is any reason for believing that is just or unjust, that it is likely to be salutary or otherwise; and here, if the House will permit me, I will distinguish a little between the different portions of the revenues of the Irish Church. I must not be understood as saying that the question of disestablishment might not, to some extent, involve some change in the appropriation of the revenues of the Church. I have never said that, because it is manifest that there may be revenues so obviously connected with the position of dignitaries in an Established Church, as such, that I would not for a moment say, if it ceased to be an Established Church, the raison d'être of those particular possessions might not, either to some extent or altogether, cease. That is undeniably the case with the Episcopal revenues, and no one dealing with the question with that degree of honesty and candour with which I shall, at all events, try to deal with it—for I shall express my real opinions as they appear to my own mind—I say that no one so dealing with the question can fairly and truly say that the amount of the episcopal revenues, or the number of episcopal sees, now existing in Ireland, has nothing nothing to do with the position of the Church as an Establishment. No one can truly say that they have not so much to do with it, as to make it very difficult here to separate the question of establishment from that of endowment. These Bishops are all directly nominated by the Crown, and they sit by turns in the House of Lords. Take away the Crown nomination and patronage, and the Parliamentary position—let the Church be reduced to the position of a Disestablished Church, with the right to make and multiply its own offices and appointments freely, pari passu with the other voluntary Churches of the kingdom—and I cannot carry the argument myself so far as to maintain that the same amount of episcopal revenues can be claimed by the Church, or that the episcopal revenues stand on the same footing as the parochial revenues. And I will not enter into the question whether or not it would be just or obviously necessary to take away the whole of those episcopal revenues. I wish to make my argument as cogent as I can on those points where it seems to me to be impregnable; and I will, for the moment, assume that the burden of proof is so shifted on myself, as to this point, that I am unable to satisfy it as to the whole amount of those revenues. I will also suppose the same as to the capitular revenues, and also that those funds which are in the hands of the Ecclesiastical Commissioners are to be dealt with as in the same category. Those altogether amount to a very considerable sum, because the aggregate of the three is not less than £186,651 12s. 8d. a year. But this leaves untouched the case of the parochial endowments, which correspond with the rectories of Canada and the United States, of which I have spoken, and in which the people have the real vested interest. Their case stands thus—The total amount of the endowments of the parochial clergy in Ireland is £395,180 17s. 10d., of which £329,087 17s. 10d. is derived from the tithe rent-charge; the sum of £62,124 12s. 1d. from glebes; and the rest from miscellaneous sources of smaller amount. How stand the facts as regards the population of the parishes that are so endowed? I find from the Commissioners' Report, that, if you take the figures at which they propose to suppress benefices—namely, forty Church members—I do not say whether that is a right principle or not—there are 199 such benefices, with a total annual value of £37,097 12s. 6d. In their last appendix they give the total number of parishes having less than 200 Church members, which number is 431. The House will recollect that the total number of parishes in Ireland is something above 1,500. Therefore less than one-third of the whole number are parishes with less than 200 Church members, which includes the 199 parishes having less than forty Church members. The income of these 431 parishes is £54,620. Suppose, then, you were even to take all that away, in addition to the total episcopal, capitular, and Commissioners' fund, you would still leave the sum of £340,000 as the present endowment of parishes, in every one of which there are more than 200 members of the Church.

Now, let us consider the sources of these endowments. It would be a great mistake to imagine that the present Irish Church remains in possession of the whole of the ancient national endowment of the ancient Church of Ireland. The whole course of centuries, down to the present time, has been occupied in its spoliation. Take one item—the tithe rent-charge. That is computed to represent not more than one-sixth of the original value of the tithe. It has been melted away by various processes. A large portion has been appropriated from time to time by lay hands. In the latter part of the last century, when, by several actions at law, the right of the Church to agistment tithe had been established—that is, tithe on pastoral land, and Ireland is a great pastoral country—an Act of Parliament was passed which abolished that tithe altogether. Then we come to the Composition Act of 1823. The compositions for tithes were very much below their value, and by that Act those compositions were made permanent. Then came the Cess Act of 1834, which threw all the repairs which would be met in England by the church rate upon the funds of the Church. Then we come to the Commutation Act of 1838, which, as the House knows, gave one-fourth of the commutation, which was paid on the amount of composition, to the landlord as the price of collection. In that way, I find it stated in the second Appendix to the Report of the Irish Church Commissioners, that the whole value of the remaining tithe is not more than one-sixth of the original value, or, as Mr. Shirley says in his Historical Sketch, which the Commissioners have published, only a fraction of the original tenth remains to the clergy—scarcely a larger portion than would have fallen to their lot if the whole tithe had been a national provision, and had been divided between the Church of Rome in Ireland, the members of the other Churches, and the Protestant Episcopal Church itself. Recent measures as to tithes, church rates, and ministers' money are stated to have had the effect of diminishing the revenues of the Church, even during the present century, by nearly £250,000, or about one-third of the whole amount. Let us not speak, therefore, as if the entire ancient ecclesiastical revenues of Ireland remain, and are still enjoyed by a small minority of the population. It will be seen, on the contrary, that they are in possession of property not much, if at all, more than equal to their due proportion of the population in general. I do not pretend to put this matter before the House with numerical exactness. I merely mean to say that the disproportion is not anything like what it would be if all or the greater part of the ancient provision made for the Church in Ireland, when the people were united in religion, still remained in the hands of this small minority. Now I want to consider what the effect of this Bill would be on these endowments. Practically, the Bill takes away everything, saving only the life interests, and private endowments since 1660. I will consider the life interests presently; but I want now to know whether there is really and truly a clear and satisfactory distinction between these private and non-private endowments. I know that my right hon. Friend the late Member for South Lancashire—I ought to have spoken of my right hon. Friend by that title, which I am much more happy to apply to him—that of Prime Minister of England—I know that my right hon. Friend is perfectly aware that, except as a matter of sentiment, there is no distinction, because he said so. In his speech at Liverpool, he said that the sentiment was irresistible. I confess I agree with him. I think the sentiment is irresistible, when you propose to take away private endowments. But I carry it somewhat further. I think it is equally irresistible with regard to all private endowments whatever. I have said there is no distinction in principle between the case of private and other endowments. And why? Because the private endowments were given to the Established Church. And, if it be true that the glebes given by Kings—and the tithes given by ancient piety, and afterwards consolidated by law—are to be regarded as given to the Church, only as an Establishment—given on condition of the continuance of its privileges by the State, as a Church having its institutions united by law to the political institutions of the State—it is irresistible logic that the donors of these private endowments must be held to have given them just as much to the same institution, and for the same reason. The real truth is, that if you try to find any solution of the question, you must look to general considerations of reason, policy, and justice; and I say that reason, policy, and justice oblige the man who takes away to show the reason why he does it. To my mind, that reason has not yet been shown. But now let us consider what this distinction between public and private endowments, since the Reformation, really is worth. The whole of the glebes in Ulster, and by far the greater part of those in other parts of Ireland, were given after the Reformation. And how were these estates given? Were they given by Acts of Parliament or by solemn acts of the State, to which you can refer, and on the face of which you can find that the gift was upon condition of the continuance of the existing state of relations between the institutions of the Church and the institutions of the State? They were given by Kings, out of lands which came by confiscation into the hands of those Sovereigns, exactly as those Sovereigns gave other portions of the same lands to private persons, whose descendants enjoy them to this day. I own it was a matter of some surprise to me to hear, I think from my right hon. Friend, but, at all events, from one speaker on the Treasury Bench, that these glebes, and parts of the tithes which are dealt with by the present Bill, were given by way of restitution, because they had previously been taken from the Church by some former process of disendowment. It certainly is a very formidable doctrine that you are to go back from the existing title to a more remote title, which had been destroyed, and, on the ground that the new title is to be referred to the old, to conclude, for some reason connected with the old, that the property itself is to be taken away. A most formidable doctrine this, I must say, and especially for the New Voluntary Church Body, which you are going to create under this Bill. According to that doctrine, there will certainly be no security for the New Church Body—no security for the churches or houses which may be left to them—no security for anything which may be saved through the commutation of their life interests. For these may all be said to be, in some sense, a residuum remaining out of the old endowments. I confess it seems to me that when a State gives freely and does not annex specified conditions—when Kings, more especially at periods of our history which enabled them to deal with property as if it were altogether their own, or when private individuals give property to persons capable of taking it by legal titles, titles as valid at the time of the gift or grant as any private titles could be—when that is done, the gift takes effect exactly in the same manner, to all intents and purposes, whether the donor be the King, the Parliament, or a private individual. You must look at the title, see when it was granted, and what conditions were annexed, and if the conditions were the same in one case as in the other, there is no more justice in taking away the property in the one case than in the other.

I have thus given my reason for not thinking that you can possibly stop at private endowments, or at Churches, if you recognize the principle of some moral claim on the part of this body, even after it should cease to be established. I may perhaps be permitted to say one thing more in this connection. If we are to frame for ourselves hypotheses as to the motives and reasons for these grants, and to say it was because the Church was established, and it was supposed it would continue to be established, that these gifts were made, and that now it is to be disestablished these grants are to be withdrawn and to revert to the country, I should like to know, that line of argument once adopted, where we are to stop? I pointed out in the early part of these observations that the Established Church did not mean the same thing at all periods of our history; that it was very different before the Toleration Acts from what it was afterwards. Before the Toleration Acts, the idea was that the State and the Church were absolutely one, and everybody was bound by law to be a member of the Church. Some one may improve upon the view I am at present combating, and may say that the reason why all the endowments granted to the Church, at all events from public sources, down to the Revolution of 1688, were so granted was because at that time all persons were supposed to be of one religion, and were in fact required to be so by law; but that the law on that subject being changed, cessante ratione cessat lex. In other words, such a line of argument puts it in the power of any one taking a retrospective view of history to annex conditions, not expressed, to all ecclesiastical property whatsoever, and, because of the changes which have occurred in our legal, social, and political systems, to say that those unexpressed conditions have been violated, and therefore that the State has the right to resume the property. That, I say, would be a new and very formidable doctrine. Then I come to the next point, the limit of 1660. The principle upon which that date has been adopted appears to me more difficult to understand than almost anything else in the Bill. It is said that because the Thirty-nine Articles of the Church of England were not adopted by the Irish Church until 1634—not 1660—and because the system of Church government and Church discipline in Ireland may have been practically consolidated, in its present exact form, after the Restoration rather than before, you are therefore to take matters as if an entirely new start had been made, and a new Church established, and as if all kinds of endowments given between the Reformation and that date of 1660 had been given to some Church other than the present. But those who say so cannot possibly be ignorant of this plain matter of fact that, by the legislation—which few of us entirely approve—of the 2nd of Elizabeth it was expressly stated that the whole of the bishoprics in Ireland were to be in the nomination of the Crown, as they were in England, and even more absolutely; that the Liturgy of the Church of England as such was to be in use in all churches in Ireland, and everybody was to be obliged to conform to it; and that this included the Ordination Service, and everything else characteristic of the constitution and discipline of the Church of England. And although it may be true that the Thirty-nine Articles were not adopted till 1634, will anybody say that there was not substantial community of doctrine and of worship in the two Churches in the interval—at all events as far as the law was concerned; or will anybody say that persons who gave private endowments during that interval gave them with a view to the Roman Catholics usurping the benefices, as they did in some portions of the country during a considerable part of that interval, or with a view to Episcopalian clergymen fraternizing in other places with Presbyterians—as my right hon. Friend said they did fraternize—possibly very much to the benefit of both? It is evident that the gifts must have been to the Church then established by law, and not to some other Church which, as the law stood, could not then exist. The suggestion is that there was a good deal of confusion, and a good deal of usurpation of benefices in different parts of Ireland, by persons not conforming to the Established Church, during the interval of which I have been speaking. I believe that there is much exaggeration in this statement; but, if it were ever so true, it could not justify the assumption that persons who gave endowments to the Church established by law before the year 1660 did not mean the same thing as persons who gave endowments after that date. Why, the very confusion, the very invasion by Roman Catholics here, and Presbyterians there, must have made the inducement stronger to give new endowments to the Church to replace what she had lost.

And now I come to a question of much more importance. Why do you respect only life interests? Are there no others? I say there are. And the Bill, in this respect, seems to me the ne plus ultra of that system,—I hardly know how to characterize it without using some word stronger than I should wish to do—of that practice which too much prevails in our legislation, of looking to the individual interests of persons who discharge public duties, more than the rights and interests of those for whose sake they discharge them. It is a distinguishing feature of the present working system of the Church of England that there is hardly anything for which a clergyman once appointed can be turned out of his living. But who are the persons who have the real interest and benefit in the ministrations of the clergyman? The people of that religion whose minister he is. They are the persons whose servant he is. And when you find that there is a community, necessarily permanent, which your legislation neither will destroy, nor is meant to destroy, who will continue after it has taken effect with the same spiritual needs as before, and obliged either to go with these needs unsupplied, or to find new pecuniary means for their supply, then, I say, the true vested interest is the interest of those persons, and not that of the minister. Now, let us look at what is proposed. It is proposed to give to these persons their churches—a costly boon. Let me not for a moment be misunderstood. I should be truly sorry if they were not to have their churches. But still it is a costly boon. We find from the Commissioners' Report, that at this moment, the total annual cost of their maintenance, including repairs, for the year 1867, was £62,043 17s. 11d. They have been maintained out of the Church funds exclusively—not a shilling, not a penny has been levied from the people, since the abolition of cess in 1834. You are now going to throw that £62,043 17s. 11d. upon the members of the Church, besides everything else, although they will no longer have the Church funds to assist them. Now, let us see how the fact stands, as to whether there are such persons—large permanent bodies, in parishes as populous as ordinary English parishes are—who have the local claim, who will continue to have it, and from whom you are taking away this property, not to give it to anybody else; for this disposal of the surplus—although I have not a word to say against it if there be a surplus—is manifestly an ingenious discovery under great difficulties, for the purpose of finding out what to do with it. Now, let us see whether there are in truth such people as I have referred to, existing to any great extent in Ireland. I find it stated in one document appended to the Commissioners' Report, that, in one-third of the dioceses in Ireland, all the parishes are sufficiently populous to require the exclusive services of a resident ministry, so that it would be inexpedient and unfit to unite any other parish to them; and that, as to the other two-thirds of the dioceses, one-half of the parishes are so. That is the general statement; but it applies still more forcibly to particular parts of the country. With the permission of the House, I will take for illustration two dioceses in the North of Ireland—first, the united diocese of Derry and Raphoe, and, secondly, the united diocese of Down, Connor, and Dromore. In the first of these dioceses there are 111 benefices, to only twenty of which is there is attached a less Church population than 200. One of them has more than 3,000, seventeen of them between 1,000 and 2,000, three between 900 and 1,000, seven between 800 and 900, nine between 700 and 800, seven between 600 and 700, fourteen between 500 and 600, twelve between 400 and 500, eleven between 300 and 400, and ten between 200 and 300. Now, anywhere else, should we say that these were not cases in which the population was adequate to a permanent endowment? I say nothing against anybody who might suggest that by possibility in some of those places the endowment may be excessive, and more than can be justified by the population. If such be the case, let that be the subject of investigation and adjustment. I would yield this, as I have yielded some other things for the sake of peace, where I was not bound by justice to maintain them. But surely these are populations which have some right to say—"We ought not to suffer. You are taking away from us our permanent endowments, although you provide for our servant the minister, and are giving us in return no compensation whatever, although we want an endowment as much as ever we have done, and have not done anything whatever to forfeit it." Let me now take the population connected with the benefices in the diocese of Down, Connor, and Dromore.

Of eleven parishes in Belfast the aggregate population is 24,534. Of the remaining 133 parishes only twenty-four have a population under 200; one has a population of above 5,000, one between 4,000 and 5,000, six between 3,000 and 4,000, nine between 2,000 and 3,000, seventeen between 1,000 and 2,000, seven between 900 and 1,000, three between 800 and 900, eight between 700 and 800, seven between 600 and 700, eleven between 500 and 600, seven between 400 and 500, fifteen between 300 and 400, and seventeen between 200 and 300. From these 109 parishes having such a substantial population, you propose to take away all provision for a religious ministry. But this does not apply only or principally to populous parishes in towns, where it is comparatively easy to supply the religious wants of the population. The Rev. Mr. Sadler, a clergyman of the Church of England, who has written a very able pamphlet upon this subject, and in whose views I may say I almost if not altogether agree, has given a table of the Protestant Episcopal population of forty-four parishes, merely as examples, and many more might be found. He has excluded from that table all places containing either the whole of any large towns or any parts of them. In every one of those forty-four parishes there is a population of at least 300, and in many of them much more, and they are scattered over no less than twenty-five square miles, and in some instances over thirty-five square miles, being eight times the area of average English parishes. In one of those parishes there is a population of above 4,000, in another of above 3,000, in two of 2,000, in thirteen of 1,000 and so on below that number. In those cases the people are in such circumstances, that it is very difficult indeed to suppose that, if you take away from them the existing provision for religious ministry, they will be able to supply one for themselves. But is it not quite plain, that, unless you can show that in taking away that provision there is some manifest good to be done—that it is to be given to somebody who has a better right to it—you are doing a wrong to these people? Because I say that to take away my property, not because it belongs to somebody else, but because you want to take it away, is doing me a wrong.

Passing from that point, I would ask,

what would be the result of the change you propose to effect? And here I will take the liberty to refer to the appeal which was so eloquently made by the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Board of Trade on Friday last, in that splendid speech, which we all heard with so much interest. May I be excused if I respectfully take the liberty of saying that I listened to that speech, and all other recent speeches made in this House both this year and last by the right hon. Gentleman upon this subject, not merely with intellectual admiration, but with a very large degree of moral sympathy. He does not accept my conclusions; he thinks both them and my reasoning entirely wrong; but I do take the liberty of saying, that with the feeling which actuated and animated him in those speeches I entirely sympathize; and it is only because I think that unjust which seems to him just, because I think that although his end is good his means are not so, that I do not go along with him, as, if I were merely to indulge my feelings after hearing his powerful appeals, I might be disposed to do. The right hon. Gentleman endeavoured to show that, after all, the effect of the proposed change would not be the spiritual destitution of these communities of the Church. I wish to avoid the fallacy of generalizing, by speaking of the Church as a whole. I will, therefore, not speak of the Church as a corporation, because hon. Members have been very properly pulled up for speaking of the Church as such. When you speak of the Church as a whole, you lose sight of some of the main points of the question. It is of the endowed communities of the people in the parishes that I want to speak. The right hon. Gentleman says—"Why entertain such gloomy views? Why have you not more faith in the power of your religion? Don't you remember what happened in Scotland? Don't you remember that magnificent spectacle?"—and it was a magnificent spectacle, one of the finest moral spectacles which history has ever presented—"of that great body of men who went out for conscience' sake from the Establishment, without any compensation for vested interests, leaving house and home, and immediately betaking themselves to the founding of a new Church,"—with that remarkable and extraordinary result, which the right hon. Gentleman so powerfully depicted. I would, however, ask the House whether there is not a very great fallacy in pointing to that spectacle as an example to us at the present moment, as if that case possibly could be like the one we are now considering? In the first place, I beg to observe that the State has dealt very differently with the Established Church in Scotland from the way in which she has dealt with the Episcopal Church both in England and in Ireland. The Established Church in Scotland enjoys, in my humble opinion, a much better government, a much better organization—I do not allude to the difference between Presbytery and Episcopacy, of course—than the Church of England. She has her Kirk Sessions, her Presbyteries, her Synods, her General Assemblies, each step of self-government rising above the other, so that she has been well exercised in the whole art and power of self-government, self-legislation, and self-expansion, no State control coming in to stop her Synods from meeting, or from exercising all necessary powers of legislation and discipline. There the great men who afterwards became the leaders of the Free Church movement had as much liberty of speech as we have in this place. There they formed their parties, there they organized their system, there they collected together such a power and bond of moral public opinion as enabled them to go forth triumphantly, even when leaving all which in this world they possessed. Have you so dealt with the Church of Ireland? Have you not imposed upon her, as the very condition of the Establishment which you now seek to remove, such restraints as prevented that organization of the powers of self-government, that organization of ways and means, and that organization of feeling, opinion, and discipline, which we have seen existed in Scotland? I am not speaking of an abstract difference, I am speaking of a difference which had a direct practical bearing upon the very case itself; because how was the Free Church formed? Was it the birth of a moment? Did it spring up full armed like Minerva from the head of Jupiter? By no means. It was formed in the General Assemblies of the Established Church. There it was that, by legislation, by council, by deliberation, by carrying on a long battle against the powers of the State the principles of the Free Church were established and consolidated, and the bond of union formed between those who afterwards seceded. But has anything of the kind occurred, or could anything of the kind have occurred in Ireland? If it had, you might have said—"The Irish Church has disestablished itself, and must take the consequences."

The next observation I have to make is this—There is all the moral difference in the world between the man who goes out of his own accord and the man who is turned out. The man who goes out of his own accord goes out in a cause in which he is the aggressor at all events, and may think he will be the conqueror; but the man who tries to hold his own, and is not able to do so is in a very different situation, and a very long period indeed must elapse before he can arrive at the possession of an organization suitable to his altered condition. Mr. Bence Jones well remarks, that—

"A man reduced from wealth to poverty is in a very different state from one who has never been otherwise than poor, and has numberless difficulties of which the other knows nothing."

Now, as to the voluntary system. Certainly I am not one of those who have ever stood up to abuse the voluntary principle. It has done great things, and may do great things again. Christianity conquered the world under the voluntary principle; and, no doubt, in the times in which we live, it looks a little as if the world was endeavouring to reconquer Christianity, under the opposite arrangement. But though endowments may not be the summum bonum which some persons seem to believe them to be, we have, I think, a right to consider whether those who have lived under endowments can be able all at once to do equally well without them. It is said, that if the Church in Ireland should be disendowed the Protestants will be able to provide for themselves. In proof of that proposition, it is said, that the Roman Catholic Church in Ireland is able to provide for herself now by the voluntary principle. The Roman Catholic Church in Ireland does so, but certainly by means in which the clergy of the Protestant Church of that country are not instructed—by means to which the people of the Established Church are not accustomed. A Church in possession of large endowments is able to give a gratuitous ministry. Such a Church makes its people accustomed to a gratuitous ministry; but, of course, a Church which is organized on an opposite principle accustoms its people, as far as their means go, and sometimes above their means, to contribute to their own spiritual wants. Undoubtedly, in the course of time, the Church which is now endowed in Ireland might accustom itself to the voluntary system; but how long a time will be necessary for that purpose? How long a period will be required to teach those who have always relied upon a gratuitous ministry to do otherwise? It appears to me that, independently of all the changes which it may be found necessary to make in its system of local organization, you must take a long time before you can arrive at that. I think there is a fallacy in the argument used by those who say that the rich in Ireland belong to the Church with which we are dealing, and that the poor chiefly constitute the Roman Catholic Church in that country. It does not quite follow that because the rich belong to a Church they will contribute to it with a liberality proportionate to their means, especially if, as in this case, many of them are not residing on their properties; nor does it follow, that, if they do not do so, the poor will not be the sufferers. Who will be the sufferers if a ministry be not provided? Will it be the rich non-residents, or even chiefly the rich residents? No. It will be the poor, the permanent local poor—they will suffer most. You do not suppose they will change their religion upon account of the passing of this Bill. If they are not in circumstances to pay their clergy, are the clergy to depend on the rich? Bishop O'Brien says—

“To the successful working of the voluntary system numbers are of much more importance than wealth, and the diffusion of the wealth of the religious community than its amount.”

And he quotes Isaac Taylor, who observes—

“No motive that has hitherto been brought to bear upon human nature has availed to make the rich liberal after the proportion of the poor.”

But I would not have it supposed that in this case I am willing to do injustice to the rich. I ask the House to consider their position. They will for forty-five years, at all events, continue to pay tithes, though they will not have provided for them that, to provide which, and which only, tithes exist. It is true that their titles do not comprehend that interest in the land; but it is also true that the tithe rent-charge never was State property in any sense whatever. Tithe rent-charge, since the law established it—and the law only established it because conscience had done so before—has only existed as a charge on land for the express purpose of providing religious ministrations. It may be said that some of it has been appropriated by lay impropiators. That was done in bad times, and I do not think that such an arrangement could now be repeated; but I say this, that tithe rent-charge is a local charge, that it never was imposed and never could have been imposed for general or Imperial purposes, and it would be most unjust to use it for such purposes. I have high authority for that. I have a speech which contains these words—

“Those funds, gentlemen, are local funds. The tithe of a parish was never given except for the purpose of maintaining religion in the parish; and to take the tithe out of a parish of Galway or Clare for the purpose of meeting the wants of Protestant congregations in Dublin or Belfast, whatever the intention may be is—I care not who hears it—in my opinion very like indeed, and dangerously like—whatever the intention may be, that is quite another matter—an act of public plunder.”

Whose words are those? They are the words—spoken during the last election at Newton—of my right hon. Friend at the head of the Government. I do not for a moment suppose there is a syllable in them from which my right hon. Friend would now shrink. I have no doubt my right hon. Friend would repeat those words now; but if those funds are local funds, if the tithe of a parish was never given except for the purpose of maintaining religion in the parish, and if to take the tithe out of a parish in the West or the South of Ireland for the purpose of maintaining religion in the North or the East is very like an act of public plunder, I own that I think the transfer must have the same complexion, if you withdraw such a local fund from a parish in one part of the country for the purpose of maintaining in another part of the country—no one knows where—for the purpose of maintaining lunatic asylums. I do not understand that the lunatic asylum need be in any particular parish. I do not even understand that there is to be even any approximation to that principle in the scheme of my right hon. Friend. The real truth is that the funds described by my right hon. Friend as "local funds," are funds which it is now proposed to treat as ordinary State property, disposable in any manner that Parliament may think useful on the whole, and which it is proposed to transfer from spiritual to secular, from local to general purposes. What I think on this point cannot be better stated than in the words of a very able man, the Knight of Kerry. He says—

"It may be held to be quite right that a great public good should be effected, even where it inflicts wrong on an individual; but it is fair, at least, to admit that it is wrong. I think the case may be made more clear by excluding the ecclesiastical element for a moment, and treating it on ordinary principles of business. Suppose, for example, that all the estates in this country were liable to a charge of, say 1s. per pound for the maintenance of some necessary local institution—the county hospital for example—which we will suppose, moreover, had for centuries been supported from this fund and this fund alone; would not all the landowners of this county have just cause of complaint, if an Act of Parliament siezed the above fund for the public Exchequer, and left them either to support the hospital out of their own pockets or to allow it to collapse? I confess it does seem to me that a serious injustice would be done in this case, and I cannot possibly see where the parallel fails."

Hitherto I have dealt with the sufferings and loss that will be inflicted upon this portion of our fellow-countrymen; and I will now enquire as to the reason. First of all, have they done anything to forfeit the advantages which they enjoy? Now, I confess it seems to me that the considerations applicable to that question instead of leading to an affirmative conclusion, greatly add to the weight of everything which I have already advanced. How has the State dealt with this Church in past times? It has loaded her with all the evils, with all the drawbacks, and with all the difficulties, arising from the grossest misgovernment, from the grossest and most profligate spoilations, and from those detestable Penal Laws which have done so much to alienate from this country the hearts of the people of Ireland. I certainly think that it is much more owing to the acts of the State than to anything that she has done, that the Church has been laid open to the charges which are made against her. And therefore I do not think that the State is warranted in regarding as a ground of forfeiture that degree of failure in the Church in Ireland, which is mainly attributable to bad civil government and bad legislation, more especially as it is admitted on all hands that in our own time she has done her duty well. I may here refer to the expenditure which is proved to have been made upon the faith of these endowments since 1833. We read not only of all the churches and parsonage houses in Ireland being built since the Reformation, but the total expenditure in building and improvement of churches and parsonage houses amounts to £1,000,000 since 1833, and that is only the expenditure, to the recorded proofs of which the Ecclesiastical Commissioners are able to refer. Now, let us consider, for a moment, whether you do justice, when you treat that as the measure of the claim upon you, which such an expenditure creates. You cannot separate private and public expenditure in such a matter as this. You must take into account all that has been done on the faith of the possession of these endowments. Those who have supplied this money may fairly claim to have considered, not only the money which they have actually laid out, but all the other circumstances which attended that outlay. If I contribute £100, and the Ecclesiastical Commissioners give £50 in aid, is it to be said that I am not entitled, as a purchaser, to the aggregate endowment? Some talk as if the wrongs done in former times ought now to be visited, by way of retribution, upon the Irish Church of this day. But if the people who now derive benefit from those endowments are wholly innocent of those wrongs; if their clergy have been, far beyond the memory of the present living generation, exemplary, useful, and efficient, and have given no ground for complaint, it is impossible to make out a cause of forfeiture against those communities, which the moral sense of those communities at all events can be expected to recognize and allow.

I will not weary the House by referring in detail to other considerations, connected with the immigration into Ulster, with the plantation of Ulster when the improvement of lands, formerly waste and wild, was undertaken by a Protestant population, invited to come there upon the faith of their possessing an endowed Church. They were promised, and they received, a Church endowment of so many acres, in a fixed proportion to the number of acres improved and brought into cultivation by them. This part of the case is powerfully and clearly set forth in a recent declaration, numerous signed by Protestant gentlemen in Ireland; and, as it has probably been read by most Members of this House, I do not feel myself justified in repeating it here.

I will now endeavour to grapple with the argument so often adduced, and which is really the main assumption on which all the other arguments in favour of this measure are founded, that this is public State national property, which is at the present time misappropriated for the benefit of a few, when it belongs to all. That appears to me to be a doctrine which is, not on technical grounds of law but upon substantial grounds of law and fact, absolutely untrue, in the sense in which it is brought forward. I do not mean for a single moment to deny that the nation has a large interest in and control over every species of public property. But of public property there are various kinds. There is that in the public Exchequer, contributed by the taxes of the country, and there is that which is vested in the nation at large, or in the Sovereign, for purposes co-extensive with the general government of the country. These are national property in the largest and fullest sense of the word. But every species of property given for every kind of use beneficial to any portion of the community—the property of municipal corporations throughout the kingdom, the property of the City companies, the property of the Universities and of the Colleges in the Universities, the property of all hospitals and charities—is in a certain sense public property, subject to public regulation and control; and in the due management of this species of property the public has always an interest. But that is a sense, in which everyone would perceive that the State would not be warranted it treating it as disposable at its own mere will and pleasure. And, on the other hand, the public interest in it is not of that nature, which would warrant anyone in saying that the State can be called to account for its use and application, as if the State were annually giving the same amount of money for the purpose out of the public Exchequer.

There is a confusion of thought, when we fail to perceive that there are many gradations of what, to some extent, may be regarded as public property; and that money belonging to a portion of the community ought not to be taken away by the whole of the community, unless good cause of forfeiture, or proof of misuse can be clearly made out. Now, it seems to me, that to apply this principle to the local parochial endowments, in which the local communities have an interest, to deprive them of that which they would either have to supply out of their own pockets, or, still worse, go without—is much more unjust, than if you were to apply it to any kind of corporation which would cease to exist upon your taking away its means. Take the case of the monasteries, for example. They absolutely ceased to exist when they were by law dissolved; you dissolved communities which then, in the nature of things, necessarily came to an end as soon as the individual members, who were then living, died. So it would be in the case of the Colleges at Oxford and Cambridge. There is no permanent body of persons which would continue after their dissolution, and be a loser. The public, or the Church, might be a loser, by the destruction of valuable institutions; but there would be no individual persons who would be in want of what they, or their predecessors, had before. But here you are dealing with a permanent class of persons in the enjoyment of local funds, who will remain and continue in existence after you have done this, who will want those funds afterwards as much as they did before, and who will either have to supply the deficiency themselves, or go without that which is much more valuable. I cannot but think, therefore, that this plea of national property is altogether unsound. Now I frequently hear the word “prescription” employed by hon. Gentlemen opposite. Prescription signifies a title established by enjoyment for a length of time, where there is no proof of any original right. But in this case we have, with enjoyment for a great length of time, a clear legal title to that enjoyment. How did the House think it right to deal some years ago with the case of the charitable trusts in this kingdom which were enjoyed by Unitarians, but were originally founded for the benefit of Trinitarian congregations? The congregations had gradually lapsed into a different faith, and for much more than twenty years Unitarian congregations had been in the practical enjoyment of funds to which the courts of law determined they had no legal right. My right hon. Friend, and Lord Macaulay, and other great authorities said it was right even to legislate in that case for the purpose of applying the principle of prescription. I am wholly at a loss to understand why the claims of congregations of our own faith in Ireland, whose legal title is so much better, and who can urge the enjoyment of centuries in their support, should not be at least as much respected; or why the rights of those persons who have from time to time laid out their money and made all their arrangements on the faith of the continuance of these endowments should not be equally regarded. And certainly it is not an answer to say that the legislation of 200 or 300 years ago, which settled the existing title to a portion of these endowments, was a violent and oppressive legislation. Because wrong was done then, you cannot take from those who have had a valid legal title for centuries that which they have done nothing to forfeit, simply on the ground that at a remote period your predecessors may have done something equally unjustifiable.

Another great argument which I will take the liberty of referring to is the argument of equality. That seems to me, in the sense in which it is put, to be a very dangerous argument. It is new to me that it is the business of the State to abolish all inequalities of property. Of course nobody contends for this as affecting individuals; and nobody, in truth, contends for such a principle as that it is the business of the State to abolish inequality of property among religious bodies, whether they have or have not been originally created by means of public endowments. As far as I have heard in these debates, and in recent discussions of these subjects by advocates of the present measure, everybody repudiates the application of such a principle to Scotland or England. This principle of equality, when it is brought forward to justify you in taking away local funds from those who have done nothing to forfeit them—not to give them to anybody else, not to restore or redistribute them, not to establish another

Church because it is the Church of the majority, as in Scotland, but simply for the purpose of taking them away—appears to me to be a principle which cannot be worked out without going much beyond the point to which anybody at present is proposing or desires to go. You will be producing another new form and state of inequality, in some respects more remarkable, between one part of the kingdom and the other parts of it. It would be one thing if you were about to found another Established Church—it would be one thing, if you were only resuming superfluous endowments; but it is a very different thing, for the sake of bringing about equality between different classes in Ireland, to take away from one religious body, whose title is one of centuries, everything by which its possessions exceed those of another which does not advance any claim to have such possessions for itself. Although we do not carry the principle further, there may be some who will. I look with great suspicion upon a principle which, if it is logically pursued, may lead to conclusions which we all repudiate, and which we desire everybody to lay aside, because there is so great a difference, as all agree there is, between the case of the Established Churches of England and Scotland and that of Ireland. Well, then, let us legislate in a manner which that difference suggests; but do not let us lay down an abstract principle of levelling equality as a reason for doing what on other grounds we do not justify.

I have thought it my duty to say what I felt upon this subject. I do most heartily desire and pray that all my apprehensions may be disappointed; I do heartily desire that all those good effects may follow which my right hon. Friend desires, and I am sure expects, from this measure. I have said nothing upon the subject of danger to private property, because it appears to me that there is in the nature of things a broad and clear line between private property and all property of this character. At the same time I am bound to acknowledge that the circumstances of the present times are peculiar, especially in Ireland; and that in Ireland language has been and is held as to private property, which in a manner connects it with some of the same considerations, which points to its origin from confiscations in past times, and which parades the fact that it is for the most part held in Protestant hands—language which, I think, does in some measure justify the alarm of those who fear danger; and, however well we may mean, if, while proceeding in one direction we make a false step, if we go too far, if we go beyond the limits of justice in dealing with this description of ecclesiastical property, we may be helping, perhaps not to kindle, yet to fan the flame, which threatens also property of other descriptions. I trust that my right hon. Friend may deal successfully with what is called the land question. From what was said the other day by the right hon. President of the Board of Trade, we know it is not intended to deal with it in a manner which can in the smallest degree do violence to or infringe the principles of the security of property. Whether or not all the desires and hopes which have been excited in Ireland on that subject will or can be satisfied by any measure fulfilling that condition, remains to be seen. I most heartily hope and trust that they may; but of one thing I feel confident, and it is that we should be safer and upon surer ground if we were not to permit ourselves to be led to hope we can be doing good by violating the just rights and reasonable feelings of our Protestant fellow-subjects. Are they not people who have deserved well of the Crown? Whatever in their position has been false or unfortunate has been much more owing to our legislation than to themselves. If that position has been made false with a view to fortifying English interests in Ireland, I cannot but think it would be a very unjust and ungenerous thing if we were to treat them as if they had deserved ill rather than well of us for their share in fortifying those interests. They have been loyal, intelligent, and industrious subjects of the Crown, and if they are not numerically the most important, they are a very important class of Her Majesty's Irish subjects. Surely, in doing that which is needful to allay discontent, and to sow the seeds of a better feeling among other parts of the community, we should be very cautious how we wound their feelings, disregard their interests, and alienate them, perhaps, without really conciliating other classes, who are now discontented. I repeat, I heartily wish and pray that the expectations of my right hon. Friend of good from this measure may be fulfilled: I do not say they may not. Although I have offered the best arguments I could command, I am by no means insensible to the force—in many cases the great force—of the arguments urged on the other side. I have told the House how far I can, and how far I cannot go. It only remains for me to say that if this House shall pass, as I presume it will pass, in substance, this measure, I shall, for one, acquiesce in the verdict of the House and of the country; and I will do my best in Committee to suggest improvements in those details which, as it seems to me, are capable of improvement, of course without attempting anything which may be inconsistent with the decision of the House. I trust and hope that if this measure should pass into law, the members of the future disestablished Church of Ireland will not take the advice which seemed to be offered to them from the Benches opposite a few nights ago—will not think they are asked to co-operate in their own destruction by having put into their hands the means of organization for future activity and usefulness, and, as I trust, of future revival and prosperity. I hope they will gird themselves up like men, and will use the means offered them—and, putting details aside, I know no better in the main than those suggested—of completing the re-construction of their Church upon the voluntary principle; and although it cannot be without a sense of great and grievous wrong and injustice, yet still I hope they will submit, like men and patriotic citizens, to a wrong done to them by those who sincerely believe it for the general welfare, and will contribute as far as they can to that end, by setting—notwithstanding all they may have suffered—as good and bright an example of loyalty to the Crown as they have set before, and at the same time bury in oblivion all feeling of irritation, all feeling of animosity towards any other classes of the community, and endeavour to bring about, even out of this measure, so injurious to them as I cannot but think it is, as much as possible of future good.

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL: * I hope the House will acquit me of being guilty of any affectation of false modesty if I say that I follow my hon. and learned Friend to-night with great reluctance. It is always a hard matter to re-engage the attention of an audience after a speech so admirable, yet making such severe demands upon close and sustained attention, as that to which we have just listened from the lips of my hon. and learned Friend. But, in addition to this obvious disadvantage, when I remember where he is sitting, where he ought to be sitting, and where, but for his difference with the Government, he would be sitting—that in some sort it is through him that I am standing here instead of in my proper place below the Gangway; that he has raised the character of our great profession—may I say, without offence, that he has raised the character of public men—by the example he has given us of magnanimous superiority to all sordid motive and selfish aim, the House will believe I know that nothing but a sense of duty would have led me to place myself in antagonism to my hon. and learned Friend, and attempt to act the part of critic instead of the more congenial part of follower and admirer.

It is, of course, for him to decide whether the difference between us is one which is really worth the sacrifice he makes for it. The less the difference the greater, no doubt, and the nobler, the sacrifice which it entails. But, if I rightly comprehend it, the difference is one which no intellect less subtle than his could have discerned, no language less keen and refined than his could have intelligibly discriminated. Disestablishment he fully understands, and he makes no objection to it. This is some comfort; for I have seen and heard of clergymen, from Archbishops downwards, who say they find a difficulty in understanding what it means. I think they could understand it if they were to try; and, at all events, the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Buckinghamshire and my hon. and learned Friend find no such difficulty. To disendowment in itself my hon. and learned Friend has no objection either. In the Roman Catholic parts of Ireland, where Protestants are few in number and scattered in habitation, where, probably, if the State ceases to support the Church, they will find it hard to support it themselves, there—where one would think, if anywhere, there was an excuse for State support—my hon. and learned Friend is willing to disendow and extinguish it. But where the Protestant population is large and wealthy—where, if they really care for their religion, they can support it and ought to support it without the smallest difficulty—there we violate some principle in leaving it to such support; and at this point and on this ground my hon. and learned Friend breaks from us. Says he—“This is in truth confiscation, because endowment apart from establishment is only the holding of property; all religious bodies hold property to a greater or less degree; this religious body in certain parts of Ireland does not hold too much, and therefore it is against justice to touch its property in those parts of Ireland.”

My hon. and learned Friend has too often shown that he can leave the Court of Chancery behind him when he chooses and discuss the affairs of men like a great and broad-minded Statesman to mind my saying that for once and to-night he has brought the Court of Chancery into the House of Commons, and has argued this question to us as if we were a tribunal to administer a settled law instead of an Assembly to change it if a call for change be shown. Why, the whole case is in truth given up when it is conceded that the Establishment as an institution is indefensible, and that on the highest grounds and for the most religious ends it must be abandoned as an Establishment. It is the great symbol of Protestant ascendancy; it is not just that Protestant ascendancy should be continued; and with the thing signified the symbol must perish. But how does the Establishment hold its endowments? Why, because it is the Establishment; not from any necessary or inherent connection between the property which it holds and the Thirty-nine Articles which it subscribes, but because the State determined to have a national Church; and in the time of Queen Elizabeth, as the right hon. Member for Buckinghamshire said, it ill-treated the Irish clergy of that day by imposing fresh terms on them as a condition of their holding their property—terms inconsistent with all their settled religious convictions; because it disendowed and disestablished, with no protection for vested interests, the then Church of Ireland, and established and endowed the present Church of Ireland through the four provinces of the island. And does not my hon. and learned Friend see that you cannot localize a national iniquity, nor circumscribe within provincial limits, still less within parochial, the operation of a national disease? The Church, though not a corporation, is a whole; it is established as a whole; it is endowed as a whole; it insults the Irish feeling as a whole. You cannot break it up into parishes and congregations, and say this parish is a grievance and that not; this congregation is too rich, this rich enough, this not adequately wealthy. Parishes and congregations are not thought of, are not established, do not hold their property as parishes and congregations, but as parts of one great united integral whole. Defend the whole if you will and if you can—that is intelligible; but from this the sense, the wisdom, the charity, of my hon. and learned Friend alike utterly recoil; and I say it is not intelligible, it is not practical, it is not possible to defend it here and there to give it up. You must maintain it or abandon it on principle and as a whole. And as a whole I understand my hon. and learned Friend is not prepared—is any one in the House prepared?—to uphold and to defend it. I pass therefore from the ingenious, striking, clever, but utterly unpractical speech of my hon. and learned Friend and proceed to consider how far this measure is right in principle, and what is the real weight of the prominent objections to it.

In this portion of the discussion it is impossible not to feel the truth of the observation of the hon. Member for Bradford, that there is a certain unreality in the whole debate. The subject has been debated out here and elsewhere, the verdict of the country has been asked and has been given, and the right hon. Gentleman opposite and those who sit behind him, know as well as we know that it has been decided. I will, however, endeavour to consider it, first, on principle, and I say that it is an institution which, apart from and prior to argument, is generally felt as it now exists to be indefensible. You hardly ever meet an intelligent man even among those who, now that it does exist, would not abandon it, who does not wish it never had existed at all. For no man can help seeing that even if it was as right as it seems to be wrong, yet as the vast majority of the Irish people do not think it right; as they think it very wrong, very unjust, and very insulting, there ought to be some enormous counteracting practical advantage to justify its maintenance in the face of this strong and undoubted feeling. Now, is there any such practical advantage? It is said that the clergy of the Establishment are what Dean Swift called them 150 years ago, excellent resident country gentlemen in black coats and white neck-cloths. I dare say they are—as a rule they are good, and high principled men—and they are resident—at least the inferior clergy are so—and no doubt do good where they reside; but this seems an utterly inadequate reason for keeping up a great religious Establishment, and if you want a resident gentry it would be far simpler and more honest to call them so and pay them to reside, than to call them clergymen and defend them as squires.

In the very able speech of the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for Dublin University, you would have expected, if any where, a defence of the existing state of things; but I listened in vain. An exceedingly ingenious and interesting attack on voluntary religion in principle and practice was made to take its place. But this was hardly to the point. Scotland and America, New Zealand and South Africa, show that he is entirely incorrect in point of fact. But suppose he was correct, how does that meet the argument that this is a bad Establishment, and show that you ought to keep up an Establishment that is bad? It would be of just as much and just as little value in defence of a Mahometan Establishment in Scotland, or of a Roman Catholic Establishment in England and Wales. Is this, then, a bad Establishment? It is established by force of law. It has great privileges, it has considerable wealth, its Bishops are Peers of Parliament, its priests have a dignified and legal status—yet it is the Church, and always has been from the first, the Church of about one in seven. Without argument and apart from historical experience, it is plain that in a free country such a Church could only be maintained by force. It has been so maintained. It is so maintained. It cannot be maintained otherwise. It is therefore as Mr. Roebuck called it, in 1849, a badge of slavery. It is a thing which, in our own case, we should not submit to for a year, which we should never rest till we had flung from off our necks, and which we ought not to expect—which I say we ought not even to wish—that a free people should be so degraded as to acquiesce in. In fact, as the First Napoleon observed in time of war, it operates as a diversion of from 30,000 to 40,000 men. The English Army, for the duties it has to perform, is singularly small. A handful of men suffice for the needs of most of our colonies, a few men are enough for England, a few for Scotland; but in Ireland, around the slumbering ashes of a people's discontent, which a breath might in a moment kindle into flame, you keep watch and ward with a formidable force, lest at any time they burst into conflagration. Force is indeed the usual solution of Irish difficulty—the usual reply to Irish complaint. We are too apt to answer Irish argument by English guns, and to turn a deaf ear to remonstrances which we can silence, and resistance which we can overcome in this simple and primitive fashion. Our notions of Irish right and wrong are pretty accurately described by the Pirate of antiquity—

Argumenta, manu qui gerit arma, tenet."*

Next, it is said to be a sentimental grievance. I confess I hate the expression—sentimental grievance. A sentimental grievance is a grievance which is felt, and almost all political grievances are grievances of this sort. The corrupting despotism of the French Emperor, the Dutch supremacy in Belgium which led to the Revolution, the Stamp Act which cost us North America, the civil rule of the Pope and the Cardinals in Italy, are all sentimental grievances. And when we talk of this as sentiment, I ask again, how should we like it ourselves? and how long should we endure it? But it is, in truth, something more than a grievance to the feelings. It is an actual loss to the majority; for if the law, supported by English power did not appropriate these endowments, they could be made useful to the majority, and it is the majority who have the right to them. But it is said that we are affecting the rights of property by this measure. This, however, whether in law or in statesmanship, is utterly untenable. There is no property in any legal sense to be affected. The incumbents have a property, and that is carefully protected; I agree, as a matter of course, and claim no merit for it. But the Church, as a whole, has no property. It is not a corporation, and can hold none; and if it be intended to say that the laity have an interest in the benefits the clergy derive from it, then I say that interest is a very different thing from property; that the laity which has this interest is the miserable minority of the population, and cannot place its interest against the interest of the great majority of the people.

The Solicitor General

The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Buckinghamshire, indeed, spoke of sacrilegious spoliation, I know not whether by way of "heedless rhetoric" or careful eloquence; and he proceeded to his one excellent and telling joke, that about the Irish country gentlemen all living on voluntary contributions. But not satisfied with a good joke, he went on to turn it into earnest, and gravely argued that we might as well take away their property from the three great endowed hospitals of London because other unendowed hospitals were doing excellent work of the same sort without it. A more singularly unfortunate illustration it is impossible to conceive. Those great hospitals stand open night and day, and are full to overflowing of the poor, the sick, the maimed, whose various wants are attended and whose miseries are alleviated with the promptest care, and the most consummate skill. No religious bars interpose between the sufferers and their relief. Jews, Turks, infidels and heretics, are received as tenderly and cared for as completely as the most orthodox of Christian patients. But let this state of things be altered, let the great hospitals exclude from their ministrations all classes but some small one, let their beds stand empty, and their officers be idle, let their governors be non-resident and yet draw large salaries from their endowments, let them insult public feeling and outrage public justice—let the case, in short, become analogous instead of being in every respect utterly unlike, and I venture to say that Parliament would proceed without the smallest hesitation, and amidst the universal applause of the country to compel them to do their duty, and if they either could not do it or would not do it, to abolish them without remorse.

This whole argument of the bearing of this measure upon property is full of danger to the Church of England, to the property of this country. No one can really believe that there is any serious danger to the general stability of property. The difference between public and private property, or property well established, and that between property given to religious uses, and property of any other sort, has been always recognized from the very earliest times, beginning with the statutes of mortmain in the time of Henry III. and Edward I. But if you go about persuading people that there is no difference, you do the most revolutionary thing in the world; you make them think that there is no way to do justice but by violating the laws of property, and the result will be that justice will be done, and that you, not we, will have unsettled men's minds about the laws of property in general. I should like to recommend to my right hon. and learned Friend who represents the University of Oxford the opinion of Bishop Butler on this matter. I have no doubt he reverences Bishop Butler as much as I do—he cannot reverence him more—and any one who has a contempt for that very great man, has a contempt—to adapt a good saying of the Chancellor of the Exchequer—not bred by much familiarity. This is what Bishop Butler says on this very subject—

“Property in general is, and must be, regulated by the laws of the community. This is allowed on all hands. If there be any sort of property exempted from these regulations, such exceptions appear either from the light of nature or from revelation. . . . We may, therefore, with a good conscience retain in possession Church lands or tithes, such as the laws of the State we live under give as property, and there is less ground for scruple here in England than in other countries, because our Ecclesiastical Laws agree with our Civil Laws in this matter. . . . The persons who gave these lands to the Church had themselves no right of perpetuity in them, consequently they could convey no such right to the Church.”

The right hon. Gentleman opposite has deeper feelings on this subject than Bishop Butler, and he speaks of sacrilegious spoliation where the Bishop speaks of the ordinary operation of human law.

It has been suggested, rather than stated, that instead of disestablishing and disendowing one Church we should have set up three. Thirty years ago this might have been possible; but does any one now plainly and like a man advocate this scheme? Lord Russell, frank and fearless in his honoured age, as when in the prime of manhood he led the House of Commons, does advocate it, or something like it. So does the Dean of Westminster, in his brilliant and most interesting Paper. But no present opponent of this Bill, no Bishop, no Statesman has ventured to put it forward, and if he did, it is now too late. Thirty years ago it might have been possible, but it will not do now. There is a tide in the affairs of men, and the tide has ceased to run in this direction.

In return for disestablishment and disendowment, however, the Church obtains absolute and entire freedom. I hope the Church will make good use of it. I am not without some fears as to the effect upon moderate opinions and general toleration of this part of the scheme. I wish it had been possible to take some security for the maintenance of the standards of doctrine according to their present wise breadth and liberality. But I see that it is not possible, and I acquiesce with the less reluctance that wiser men than I am are firmly convinced that the dangers, if there are any, of the new state of things will lie in an exactly opposite direction. There is also the great advantage of starting with a considerable and very respectable endowment from the capitalization of the life incomes of the incumbents which this measure holds out to the Church. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Buckinghamshire and the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for Trinity College have both said that they do not think this likely to be made use of by the Bishops and clergy of the Church, and that the benefit—if it be one—will turn out to be illusory. I hope not. It would be a great reflection upon such a body of men as they are if I could believe it to be true. No doubt the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Buckinghamshire has studied them much longer and knows them much better than I do. Many years ago, in one of those exceedingly clever books which we read and re-read still with constant pleasure, he said of them, in relation to the Irish missions—“As long as these funds lasted their missionaries made proselytes. It was the last desperate effort of a Church that had from the first betrayed its trust.” These are not my expressions; they are the expressions—I do not presume to say they are the opinions—of the Church's now chosen champion. But unless they are still true, unless the Church should still betray its trust, it ought to take, and it will take, this opportunity, as the Free Kirk of Scotland did, to acquire a firm footing in the country, and to build up an ecclesiastical fabric equal to its wants. With the example of Chalmers and his great associates before their eyes—while the sacrifices asked of them are nothing to compare to the sacrifices which the Scotchmen underwent—I cannot believe, and do not believe that they will be wanting to themselves and the occasion. When Innocent IV., according to the old story, showed the great Dominican the treasures of the Vatican, he told him that the Church could no longer say, “Silver and gold have I none.” “True,” said Aquinas, “neither can she say ‘Arise and walk;’” and it is certain that if, for the first time in history, the Church in Ireland is to be a real religious influence and a great moral regenerator, it will be from the joint effect of being disestablished by Parliament and endowed by its own efforts and its own munificence.

Indeed, the Church owes some reparation to that unhappy country for the wrongs which it has inflicted. I do not wish to go through the dreary story of the Penal Laws and the ferocious cruelties wreaked upon the Roman Catholics for so many long years. In Hallam, in Burke, in Massey, in Sir Henry Parnell, in many other writers you may read, if you will, that dismal history. But two things I will mention. You may see in the 80th page of Mr. Greville's book, The Past and Present Policy of England towards Ireland, a statute so loathsome, promoted by the then Duke of Grafton, passed by Christian clergymen—for I suppose the Irish Bishops of those days were at least professing Christians—but to the honour of England instantly and indignantly rejected by the English Government—a statute, I say, so loathsome that I will not speak of it here, and but for the detailed account of it given by Mr. Greville, and Mr. Greville's own character, I should have disbelieved the possibility of its existence. I wish to remind you also of the famous Return extracted in 1842 from the Probate Office in Dublin, showing that ten contemporary prelates left in Irish personal property alone—not including land, remember, nor property which paid duty elsewhere—£1,575,000. These things have passed away; but there stands the Church which made them possible, and with whose present life these hateful memories are inextricably blended.

There are many other matters on which I should like to say something. The supremacy—the line of 1660—the question of Maynooth—the absence of any attempt in the Bill to define the clergy and laity of the new body. But I will not weary the House—long since anxious to be much more solidly and practically employed than in listening to me—and therefore I will stop. I will say only that such are some and some only of the considerations which lead me to support this Bill, and by which I am brought to think that any objections I have yet heard to it are poor and weak. To a clever man it is always easy to pick holes; to an ingenious man it is always easy to make objections. But the question for the House to-night is whether, in its broad outlines, this great measure does not afford some prospect of bettering the state of Irish feeling, and of laying the foundations of a wise and Christian policy on the part of England towards that noble but hitherto unfortunate country. To me it does, and therefore I support it.

Sir, I will not be guilty of the folly of trying to imitate the magnificent description of the future prospect of the two countries with which the President of the Board of Trade wound up his speech—and I will not try to follow him in his flight. But at least, in common with all who heard or read that description, I can heartily admire it, and earnestly hope for its fulfilment. Certainly, it is a great and glorious prospect; great beyond belief, glorious beyond imagination, ravishing us out of the present state of things and making us dwell in another—a sight, if one could but live to see to it, to make an old man young, and in the hope of seeing but the very beginning of which, though no longer a young man, I claim it as a privilege to indulge. I say the very beginning, and I say it on purpose; for of nothing am I more intimately convinced than of the comparative powerlessness of all human effort without that aid which we may hope for, which we may pray for, but which it is presumption to reckon on. Our duty, nevertheless, remains the same; if we see a wrong, to try to mend it; if we see a right thing, to try to do it; not minding what mere drops they are which we can cast into the evil sea, but casting them in; striving to break the bands and soften the distinctions which keep men and nations apart from one another, sure that if we are forgotten our good works will live, and that when these things are history it will more avail us to have advanced by one day or one hour the time when wars shall cease and discords die away, than to have won a hundred great victories, or made a thousand splendid speeches.

MR. CHARLEY said, the hon. and learned Solicitor General had observed that the hon. and learned Member for Richmond (Sir Roundell Palmer) had placed the question of disendowment in Chancery, but he (Mr. Charley) considered that the hon. Member for Richmond had put the Solicitor General in Chancery, and that the latter learned Gentleman had not been able to get himself out of it, notwithstanding the able speech he had just made. The question of disestablishment, however, touched him (Mr. Charley) much more closely than that of disendowment. On the latter question a compromise might be effected, but there could be and must be no compromise with regard to disestablishment, which involved the national recognition of Protestant Christianity and its incorporation with the law of the land. It was often urged on the other side of the House that Ireland required exceptional treatment because it was a separate nation. On this he would merely remark that the kingdom was a United Kingdom, and if hon. Gentlemen desired to deal with Ireland as a separate kingdom they ought to propose a repeal of the Union. If a Parliament sitting in Dublin declared that the Church should be disestablished and disendowed, he would bow to its decision; but he could not accept such a decision at the hands of the Imperial Parliament. The Church existed long before the Union, and the Irish Protestants only agreed to the Union because they were told it would give to their Church additional security. It had been alleged in the course of the debate that the Act of Union did not touch the question of the temporalities of the Church, but in that document occurred the words, "doctrine, discipline, and government of the Church." Similar words occurred in the Act of Union between England and Scotland, and did any hon. Gentleman really suppose that they did not protect the temporalities of the Church of Scotland? Again, he was opposed to disestablishment because he thought the whole laity had a right to the services of the clergy. This Bill appeared to show that the right hon. Gentleman had abandoned his original programme of civil justice to Ireland, or rather to the Roman Catholics of Ireland, for the Preamble set forth, not that it was "just," but that it was expedient that the Church of Ireland should be disestablished and disendowed. With regard to the revenue from tithes, only £35,000 a year—a sum little more than the amount of the Maynooth Grant—came out of the pockets of the Roman Catholic landlords, and the Protestants would be very happy to make them a present of it. Could justice be promoted by taking from the Church its property without giving it to the Roman Catholic Church which claimed it? Could loyalty be promoted by striking down the loyal Church? A great deal had been said about religious equality, but what was meant by the term? It might either mean the religious equality of the inhabitants, or the religious equality of the creeds they professed. In the former sense it already existed, as every British subject had the right of worshipping according to his conscience. If, however, it were taken to mean equality of creeds, he might be told that the Church of Ireland was established in that country while the Church of Rome was not. No doubt that was so, but it should be recollected that the Church of Rome was compensated by being entirely free from State control. One of his great objections to the Bill was that it proposed to destroy, as far as Ireland was concerned, the first estate of the realm—the spiritual peerage. Now, if that were abolished, how could the temporal peerage be retained consistently with social equality? He contended that the Church of Ireland performed all the conditions on which she obtained her property. The ancient glebe lands were bestowed on the Church by the independent chieftains before the advent of Henry II. Now, although it was absurd to speak of St. Patrick as a Protestant, seeing that the term was unknown in the Saint's time, yet undoubtedly the present Church conformed in doctrine to the old Irish Church, and consequently had a right to its revenues. The tithes within the English Pale were given to the Church by Henry II. on condition of its conformity with the Church of England, and he contended that they were the rightful property of that Church which had followed the Church of England's fortunes through all her vicissitudes. The same Church clearly had a right to the tithes without the English Pale, which a Roman Catholic Bishop (Bishop Doyle) declared to have been first collected in the reign of William III., and to the glebe lands granted in 1609. He denied that the Church in Ireland had been a failure. The Irish nobility were, if anything, more Protestant than the English nobility, and eight-ninths of the landowners were Protestants. Then the educated classes — especially barristers, doctors, and professional men — were Churchmen, in the proportion of two to one. The mercantile classes were Protestant. At the Bar there were only 216 Roman Catholics to 500 Protestants, and yet eight out of the twelve Common Law Judges were members of the Roman Church. So much for religious inequality. The right hon. Gentleman the President of the Board of Trade (Mr. Bright) had taunted the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Buckinghamshire (Mr. Disraeli) with making history as he went along. In the Bible there was an allusion to a beam and a mote, and his (Mr. Charley's) advice to the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Board of Trade was to study it before he passed judgment on others. The right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Bright) said the Puritans had been the bulwarks of our freedom; but who, he would ask, placed England under the foot of a military despot, and consigned the wretched Roman Catholics of Ireland to the tender mercies of Cromwell's troopers? But the Puritans were superior to their so-called descendants, the modern Nonconformists, in one respect. They would have no terms with Rome, and even refused to accept an indulgence at the hands of a Roman Catholic King, whereas the Nonconformists of the present day had formed an "adulterous alliance" with the Ultramontane Catholics of Ireland. The right hon. Gentleman the President of the Board of Trade had favoured the House with some other historical novelties. One of them was that the Irish Church had been imposed on Ireland by the English Parliament. The fact was that the Royal Supremacy had been accepted twice over by the Irish Parliament — first, in the reign of Henry VIII., and afterwards in the reign of Elizabeth. The right hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General for Ireland (Mr. Sullivan), had stated that only one Bishop had accepted the Reformation, but he would refer him to the Calendar of State Papers, vol. 8. temp., Henry VIII., A.D. 1539, as well as to the 2 Elizabeth, cc. 1 & 2, the Irish Royal Supremacy and Uniformity Act of 1560, passed by the Lords Spiritual and Temporal and Commons of Ireland in Parliament assembled. He found that in 1560 the names of twenty Prelates were recorded as being present in the Irish Parliament, all of whom agreed to the Act with the exception of William Walsh, Bishop of Meath, and Thomas Leverous, Bishop of Kildare. It was quite clear, then, that the corporate character of the Church was continued down to the present time, and there was evidence to show that the Irish people attended the parish churches till the latter part of the reign of Elizabeth. It was incorrect, therefore, to say that the Reformation had been thrust on the people. It had the sanction of the only legitimate authority recognized in Ireland at the time, the Lords Spiritual and Temporal and Commons in Parliament assembled. It was, however, contended that the verdict of the nation had gone against the supporters of the Irish Established Church at the recent elections, and the hon. Member for Bradford (Mr. Miall), who had pronounced a somewhat lugubrious benediction on the First Minister of the Crown, had stated that no new arguments could be advanced on the subject; but the old arguments had not yet been fairly placed before the constituencies. The Liberation Society have got the start of the opponents of the present Bill, and he would assure hon. Members on the other side of the House that the gigantic question which it involved was not to be disposed of by a half-year's discussion within and a half-year's discussion without the walls of Parliament. He was sure that there was no opinion out-of-doors sufficient to warrant the right hon. Gentleman if he should attempt to swamp the independence of the other House. He regretted, he might add, that the name of the highest personage in the realm should, on a previous evening, have been dragged into the debate by the hon. Member for Kilkenny (Sir John Gray) with no better warrant than the use in the Speech from the Throne of the very innocent words, "the re-adjustment of the ecclesiastical arrangements in Ireland." And he would ask with confidence whether the verdict of the country had been unanimously given in favour of the policy of the right hon. Gentleman at the head of the Government? According to law a verdict that was not unanimous was no verdict at all. Had not Westminster and Middlesex declared by a majority against it? Had not Liverpool, the second city in the kingdom, pronounced against it by a majority of two to one? Had not the English counties by a majority of three to one done the same thing? Had not Lancashire declared with unanimity against the right hon. Gentleman? and he had been forced to become a pensioner on the bounty of Greenwich? But, then, it was said that the voluntaries of England were in favour of the Bill. Now, his answer to that argument was that he did not think they had a right to sit upon the jury. The fact was that the Nonconformists in England were as much opposed to the Establishment in this country as they were to the Irish Establishment, while the members of the United Presbyterian Church of Scotland were equally opposed to the Established Church in that part of Her Majesty's dominions. There was no analogy whatever, he maintained, between the voluntary exodus of the Scotch clergy from their homes, in vindication of a principle for which they were ready to lay down their lives, and the expulsion from their glebes and churches of the Irish clergy, who were bound by every feeling of duty not to abandon their position. The right hon. Gentleman the President of the Board of Trade had taunted the Irish Church with want of faith. The right hon. Gentleman was very fond of quoting Scripture; in reply to that taunt he (Mr. Charley) would remind him that it was written—"Thou shalt not tempt the Lord thy God;" and if the Irish Church were sent out into the world impoverished as she would be by the operation of the Bill, they had no reason to expect that a special miracle would be wrought for her preservation. As for Penal Laws they existed in Ireland long before the Reformation, and he denied the justice of the statement which had been made over and over again in the course of the discussion that they had been imposed on the Irish people by the Protestant clergy. Penal Laws had been imposed by the Whigs on the Irish Roman Catholics because they had conspired to restore the Stuarts. The Protestants of Ireland had been the victims of repeated massacres at the hands of their Roman Catholic fellow-countrymen. In 1641, 150,000 Protestants were butchered in cold blood. In 1798 Protestants were dragged from their beds at the dead of night, and numbers of them, men, women, and children were shot, while others were allowed to perish of starvation. He adverted to these facts merely to show that there were two sides to the picture. The right hon. Gentleman now Chancellor of the Exchequer had, last year, referred to the Irish Church as the barren fig-tree of the parable, and the right hon. Gentleman at the head of the Government said that for that Church the time of probation had passed, and that for thirty-five years—that is, since 1832 she had had fair play, and something more. But what were thirty-five years? Protestantism in three centuries had made no impression upon the South of Europe, and in eighteen centuries Christianity itself had hardly succeeded in evangelizing a fourth part of the world. He denied, however, that the Church had had fair play during these thirty-five years. Ireland had been the victim of ceaseless agitation and conspiracies from the time of O'Connell downwards, and such agitation unfitted men's minds for the reception of Divine truths. It might be said that in 1848 the Irish Church had a golden opportunity, but even that was turned against her by her wily foes. Again, the work she had done could not be judged by the Census of 1861. The Church Commissioners did not ascertain the number of Churchmen in the several benefices; and until 1871 the relative numbers could not be ascertained. It must be remembered, too, that Protestants as well as Roman Catholics had been thinned by emigration, and in Upper Canada the Bishop of Ontario said they formed two-thirds of his congregation, and were his best Churchmen. That the Irish Church had not been utterly fruitless was shown by the fact that during these thirty-five years it had raised by voluntary effort, for church building and endowment, £500,000. He referred hon. Gentleman to a pamphlet recently published, entitled Church Life and Work in Ireland. In 1867, the various Church societies in Ireland raised no less a sum than £179,000. He denied, therefore, that the Irish Church had been fruitless; but even if it had the parable would teach us that it should have a still further period of probation before they resolved to cut it down, and that meanwhile they should foster and encourage it.

MR. SERJEANT DOWSE said, he wished, as an Irish Protestant Episcopalian, sent to Parliament expressly to support the present measure, to explain his views on the question. On Wednesday he presented six Petitions from four different counties in the North of Ireland, praying for the disestablishment and disendowment of the Irish Church, which the petitioners stated to be a fruitful source of discontent and disaffection. He agreed in that statement, which was justified by the history of Ireland. He admitted what was said by the hon. and learned Gentleman who spoke last—that the Irish people were discontented and disaffected before the Reformation. But after that event these feelings of discontent and disaffection were intensified by a difference of religion, and culminated on the establishment of the Irish Church, that crowning act of tyranny and oppression. The Irish people then and now regarded that Church as a great wrong and a standing memorial of conquest. Though established to encourage Anglican Protestantism, and to promote English interests, it failed to effect either purpose. The feelings of the majority of the Irish people were disregarded, their language was ignored, and their manners and customs treated with deliberate contempt. The Scotch and English settlers in Ireland had in many respects been treated no better than the native owners of the soil. Such of the Scotch as settled in Ulster did so under the promise of obtaining from the bounty of the Crown native freeholds; and their descendants of the present day found that instead of freeholds they had only a delusive tenant-right. Nor did the Irish people fare better under the Protector than before. Cromwell, no doubt, was a great man and a great Statesman, who, to use the expression of the right hon. member for Buckinghamshire, introduced into England "violent tranquillity;" but in Ireland he introduced violence without tranquillity. The Irish people suffered under the hands both of the Puritans and the Cavaliers, so that to their case might well be applied the expression—

"Quicquid delirant reges, plectuntur Achivi."

After the Restoration the Irish people fared no better, for what toleration had existed disappeared. Before that time Presbyterian ministers were frequently settled in the parishes of the Establishment; but the Irish Church, as it at present existed, became then the paramount institution of the soil, greatly to the discontent not only of the native Celtic race, but of the Scotch Presbyterian settlers. The period of the Revolution was marked in Ireland by circumstances of confiscation and civil war, and the result had not been, as stated by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Buckinghamshire (Mr. Disraeli), to combine the established religion with the national faith. That had been the effect in Scotland, but it was an abuse of terms to say it had been the case in Ireland. King William had left in Ireland a discontented people, Scotch settlers whose rights had been ignored, and an aristocracy based upon conquest and leaning upon England for support. He had left in addition a broken treaty and a Church which the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Buckinghamshire had denominated—in the days before his voice was silenced by the promptings of ambition—an alien Church. From the Revolution to the Union that Church had been the enemy of the Irish people. Its condition in the period between the Revolution and the Union had been ably described by Swift. The Irish people had seen the Bishops sitting in the House of Lords, and combining with the

Commons and Lords Temporal to pass those laws which had been unanimously denounced by every right-thinking man in this country, whether Whig or Tory, as a disgrace to humanity and a stigma on civilization. The Penal Laws had been frequently adverted to in the course of the present debate, and it had been said that they were inflicted on the Catholic inhabitants of Ireland by the Presbyterians. He denied that statement, and he could not understand where the hon. Member for South-west Lancashire (Mr. Cross) got his history from when he said that the Irish Presbyterians combined with the Episcopalians to impose those laws. The Irish Presbyterians did nothing of the sort, for they had no power to act in the matter, seeing that they were as much pariahs as the Roman Catholics until the repeal of the Test and Corporation Acts. He was reminded of one incident in Irish history by the presence of the Member for Belfast (Mr. M'Clure), who sat on that side of the House. After the glorious defence of Derry, one of the most brilliant feats of arms in their records, when Episcopalians, Presbyterians, and Nonconformists stood manfully in the breach, what was the reward the dominant Church conferred on the Presbyterians? An ancestor of the hon. Member for Belfast, a Presbyterian Dissenter, was expelled from the corporation by his Episcopalian brethren because he was a Nonconformist. There was one sentiment expressed the other evening by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Buckinghamshire, in which he entirely concurred, that they ought to approach the consideration of this question with a desire to do that which is right, and without any desire to exasperate and inflame animosity. He should therefore tell his countrymen that both sides of the House were unanimous in the desire to remedy the wrongs of Ireland, and that the only difference between them was as to the remedy to be applied. Now, with reference to the Act of Union, they had been told that the Irish Church was firmly established by that treaty, and that the 5th Article rendered it impossible that it could be either disestablished or disendowed. But, after all, the 5th Article of the treaty of Union, as it was called, was only the 5th section of an Act of Parliament, and then, who were the parties to that Treaty. The bulk of the Irish people were no parties to it. It was made behind the backs of the Irish Catholics and Nonconformists. The Protestant Anglicans, confined within the walls of their privileges, made the treaty, and their descendants insisted that the Irish nation should be bound by what had been done, although they were never consulted in regard to it. But the treaty had, since the Union, been subjected to the revision of Parliament, and those who held by the authority of the Earl of Derby were surely the last who should insist on its being kept sacred, for that noble Lord had actually abolished ten Bishops, and, in the matter of tithe commutation, had given a bonus of 25 per cent to the Irish landlords. Were they now, then, to stay their hand, frightened by the phantom of a treaty which could not prevent those who sat in that House thirty years ago from the work of Church reform, although they had not such enlightened views of public policy and public interests as they now had? It was not till after the repeal of the Test and Corporation Acts that the Irish people for the first time stood face to face with the so-called Irish Church. That Church had been condemned by public opinion. It had been condemned by every enlightened foreigner who had written on the subject. It had been condemned by the impartial Liberal mind of Europe. It had been condemned at the elections throughout the country. It had been condemned by that House, and they were now merely going through the dreary phantasm of a debate and discussing a foregone conclusion. The hon. Member for Mid-Surrey (Mr. Brodrick) said the Irish Church was not to be condemned because there was less typhus fever and small-pox in Ireland. If it were not a specific against those diseases, he (Mr. Dowse) could not see of what use it was to tell the House that this nuisance was not to be removed, because two or three other nuisances had gone before it. Had the Irish Church, then, been justly condemned? It was the Church of a small minority. ["No, no!"] He thought the arithmetical education of the hon. Member for Salford (Mr. Charley) had been greatly neglected, otherwise he could not have arrived at the conclusion that 693,000 persons were superior in number to 4,500,000 Roman Catholics.

There were in Ireland 600,000 Presbyterians and Nonconformists, including 382 Jews. The population, if properly tested, would show that the Irish Church was the Church of a small minority. He said this although he was one of the 700,000 scatterlings—as they were called by the right hon. Member for Buckinghamshire—who would have to pay for its support when disendowed. There were thirty-two dioceses of the Anglican Church in Ireland and only twelve Bishops. In eighteen of these Irish dioceses only 7 per cent of the population were Protestant Episcopalians. In the diocese of Kilfenora they were only 1 per cent. In the diocese of Dromore they were 25 per cent, which was the highest. The average over the whole of Ireland gave only 11 per cent of the population as Protestant Episcopalians. Was it not a gross abuse of language to call a Church which embraced only 11 per cent of the population a national institution? In several dioceses in Ireland the Presbyterians were not 1 per cent, but in Down they were 52 per cent, and in Dromore 32 per cent. In those portions of Ireland where the Scotch and English settled the Presbyterians were most thickly scattered; but the Episcopalians were scattered over the whole population, and the gentry were generally Episcopalians, for Episcopalianism was found to be the cheapest and the most respectable religion. In the diocese of Connor, adjacent to Dromore, the Roman Catholics were 26 per cent, in Dromore 38 per cent, and in Kilfenora 98 per cent. Their average number over the whole of Ireland was 77 per cent. If the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Buckinghamshire wanted a national Church to endow there was one for him. But the feeling of the country and the House was emphatically against the endowment of any denomination whatever. In the diocese of Dublin the Anglican Protestants were 19 per cent, the Presbyterians 8 per cent, and the rest were Roman Catholics. Having regard to these statistics, could they say that the Irish Church was a national institution? Was it fair or reasonable to have a Church in Ireland endowed not because it was true—for that argument had not been heard in this debate—but because it was there? The argument was—"It is there because it is national, and it is national because it is there." He addressed himself to this subject not as a Protestant Episcopalian, but as an Irishman who wished to rise above sectional differences and to regard this Bill as a subject of the Queen of Great Britain and Ireland. And treating this as an Imperial question he arraigned the Irish Church Establishment before the entire world as having failed to discharge her duty. And this being the verdict, the sentence of the Court must be that she be taken from that place to the place whence she came, and thence to the place of execution. If he were an Irish Catholic he should address this House in a very different tone. But although he was not a Catholic, yet he was the representative of a large and influential body of Catholics, who came by him to the Bar of that House to plead for justice to their country, and if this nuisance were not abated he would use the words of Lord Chatham upon the employment of Indians in the American War against his fellow-countrymen, and say he would "enter on that war and never lay down his arms—never, never!"—until right was done to his country. He was also the representative of some of the Presbyterians of Ulster, and he felt justified in saying that the Presbyterians were not satisfied with this institution, and that they had expressed an opinion against the existence of the Established Church in Ireland. As a Protestant Episcopalian, he was anxious that the stigma of the present state of things should be removed from his Church. He said, trust that Church to the innate vigour of its members. "Loose her, and let her go!" She could not be a greater failure in the future than she had been in the past, and he was anxious that one last chance should be given to Protestantism in Ireland. He wished hon. Members opposite took as much interest in everything else connected with Ireland as they did in the Protestant Church. He supposed they came to its defence because they saw danger to the Established Church in England in the present movement—

"——— proximus ardet

"Uclegon."

But he had no fear for the future of his Church. If she were left to voluntary effort, he believed she would go forth in vigour and energy, and spread herself through the land. The Irish Protestant

population would liberally and bountifully support the needs of the ministers and the Church. His right hon. Friend the Member for the University of Dublin (Dr. Ball) seemed to be afraid of voluntaryism; but the Catholics of Ireland were a noble illustration of what that principle could do. It was said that the Protestants had not the same power of raising money as the Catholics; but let the Irish Church follow the example of the Church of Scotland, which she would have to follow perforce, whether she liked it or not. If 450 of the ministers of a poor country could leave their manse and stipends and go out on the hill-side, and if their congregations could raise £2,500,000 for a sustentation fund for them, why should the Irish gentry, the Irish tradesmen, and the Irish professional men fear? He believed that in ten years the Irish Church would acknowledge the present First Minister of the Crown as the greatest benefactor she had ever had. He was able to give an illustration of the benefit of the voluntary system in Ireland. As a resident in the City of Dublin for the last twenty-three years, and knowing the large sums that had been raised by that system, he could positively assert that but for the voluntary system Anglican Protestantism there would have died a natural death. He would pass no censure on the present clergy of the City, but would only say that before their day Protestantism had come to so low an ebb in Dublin, in consequence of the neglect of duty by the beneficed clergy, that if it had not been for voluntary efforts in the building of free churches, and in other ways, Protestant Anglicanism would have died of inanition. There were ten or eleven of these free churches, and they were not connected with the State by any endowments, yet the ministers were in receipt of large stipends from their congregations. The ministers of these churches had so distinguished themselves by their zeal that the late Earl of Carlisle made one of them Bishop of Cork, and another Bishop of Kilmore, and the late head of the Government selected another to be Dean of a southern diocese. But whether the Irish Church suffered or not from the change, it must come. It was an act of justice, and in the words of the Sovereign on a Petition of Right—"Let right be done." He would put a case to hon. Gentleman opposite. If the Irish Catholics were 693,000, and the Protestant Episcopalians were 4,500,000, and if all the ecclesiastical revenues of the present Irish Church were held by the Irish Catholics, what would be the feelings of the Protestants? They would proclaim that the existence of the Irish Church was the most intolerable burden that a nation ever groaned under, the only difference being that the nation would hardly have time to groan before being relieved of it. He must say that he had heard no argument in the course of the debate against the Bill before the House. ["Oh, oh!"] Hon. Gentlemen opposite were such friends of the Irish Episcopal Church that the moment an Irish Episcopalian came forward to express his opinion, they conveyed pretty plainly that they did not want to hear him, inasmuch, as they knew more of the subject than he did. He was justified in saying that various as were the arguments which had yet been put forward, there had been no real argument against the Bill. The debate was opened by a speech which contained no argument against it; it passed a glowing eulogium upon established institutions and Established Churches, which would have been equally applicable to Ireland if Mahomedanism had been established there instead of Protestantism. It was too late to be telling the House the doctrines of Bolingbroke and Hume on the subject. What they wanted to hear were practical remarks on the Bill itself. He was sorry the Church had no one to say more on her behalf than had been said during the present debate. One great reason put forward why the Established Church should not be abolished was that if a Catholic were excommunicated or a Protestant Dissenter put out of the body to which he belonged there would be no body to receive him. A Church Established under the Crown existed for the purpose. What a compliment to the Irish Church! If such a thing did happen in the future, he hoped the Disestablished Church would be willing to receive him, and the more so that he would probably bring something with him to contribute to its support. A sentimental grievance—lightly as some speakers had treated it—was worthy, in his opinion, of as much consideration as any other grievance. When a nation stood forward in battle array to de-

send the national honour or to avenge an insult to its flag, or when a gentleman repelled an insult to his character—was this regarded as a sentimental grievance? The Irish were a sentimental people; and the existence of this sentimental grievance had kept them discontented and disaffected. The English nation were getting a very cheap bargain in the tranquillity of Ireland by making the Irish people a present of what did not belong to them. This was more than a sentimental, it was a religious and political grievance, which poisoned the whole social life of Ireland. His right hon. Friend the Member for the University of Dublin (Dr. Ball) said the measure would not lead to social equality. Nobody ever said the measure would lead to social equality. But in future a Bishop or dean would no longer be preferred over a Bishop or dean of the Catholic or minister of the Presbyterian Church, and in that way, at least, an important removal of social distinctions would be effected. What plan, he asked, had been put forward better than that of the First Minister of the Crown? Surely not the plan of the Church Commission. The best argument put forward on behalf of the Church was that of the hon. Member for Mid-Surrey (Mr. Brodrick) that it kept alive a lamp of truth in every parish, and that with the removal of the Church that lamp would be taken away. But the Church Commissioners were prepared to take away the lamp from every place which had not forty Protestants. Of old, ten faithful people were needed to save a city, but it required forty Irish Episcopalians to save a benefice. Another great piece of economy recommended by the Commission was that the same person should perform the duties of sexton and parish clerk. The time, however, had passed for all these compromises, and the House stood face to face with the abatement of this great grievance. The right hon. Gentleman the late Secretary of State for India (Sir Stafford Northcote) said he did not know what was meant by Protestant ascendancy, of which the Church was a badge. The hon. and gallant Member for Fermanagh County (Captain Archdall) would, no doubt, be able to instruct him in the meaning of that phrase, for he found by Debrett that he was "a firm supporter of Protestant ascendancy." If the right hon. Gentleman would only come over to Ireland on the next 12th of July, to the county of Fermanagh, which that hon. Member had represented for thirty-four years, or to the county Tyrone, he would see erected on the spires of the State churches that fatal Orange flag, the badge of degradation to the vast majority of the Irish people. ["Oh, oh!"] Protestant ascendancy did exist, he maintained, as long as one Church was patronized and preferred above another Church either of the whole or a portion of the people. And now he had done. But if he was done he had some satisfaction in knowing that the Established Church in Ireland was done too. The English people were entering on a new career,—the career of justice to Ireland; but by this great measure they were only opening the gates of the temple of justice; they had still to enter the penetralia of the temple and put their richest offerings upon its shrine. A late Statesman, Sir Robert Peel, had given the country Free Trade. The measure of the right hon. Gentleman would give the country religious freedom, and what it greatly needed—equality. By another measure, which he hoped would receive the sanction of one who was revered in Ireland—the President of the Board of Trade—security would be given to the land. These things accomplished, they would then have a happy, a prosperous, and a united people—happy, because no sense of injustice rankled in their breasts; prosperous, because they enjoyed the fruits of their own industry; and united, because the fell spirit of ascendancy would be banished for ever.

MR. VANCE said, that as representing a northern Irish constituency, he must offer his thanks to the hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for Richmond (Sir Roundell Palmer) for his able and disinterested defence of the endowments of the Irish Church, to support which he had made so great a sacrifice. The Irish laity, whose interests were most directly attacked by the Bill, had never supposed from the tenour of the Speech from the Throne that a measure of so severe a character would be applied to the Irish Church. The Church itself was disestablished, its funds transferred to other purposes, and the status of its clergy lowered. The material for disendowment in this case would be obtained from the tithe rent-charge and from the glebe lands of Ulster. There were two kinds of tithe rent-charge—one of which was purely ecclesiastical, while the other was in the hands of lay impropiators. The right hon. Gentleman the First Minister of the Crown treated the latter portion of the fund with the greatest deference; he laid no such sacrilegious hand upon it as he was laying upon the ecclesiastical tithe rent-charge. He protected the drones while he destroyed the working bees. With regard to the glebe lands of Ulster, he should observe that no argument had been advanced in defence of the appropriation of that property. Those lands had been given by Protestant Kings after the Reformation to the clergy who had accompanied the Protestant settlers; and it was puerile to say, as the Chief Secretary for Ireland had contended, that they had merely been given to the national Church of Ireland. The national Church of the country was the same at that time that it was at present; and the same proportion existed at both periods between the number of Protestants and the number of Roman Catholics. The right hon. Gentleman at the head of the Government had not kept faith in the matter. In his speech on the 30th March last year, he had distinctly stated—

“That if the full money-value of the entire possessions of the Irish Church, fairly sold in open market, were estimated, certainly not less than three-fifths, possibly two-thirds, would remain in the hands of members of the Anglican Communion.”—[3 Hansard, cxcii., 476.]

The utmost which the Bill now proposed to give in any way to the Church was £7,300,000 of a total of £16,000,000. A portion of the property of the Church was to be applied to the support of reformatories and training-schools for the deaf and dumb. There were institutions of that kind scattered all over Ireland, which were supported by voluntary contributions, and the effect of this Bill would be to dam up this stream of charity. Again, £20,000 out of the confiscated property was to go for ten years to the new Commission, while the old Commission, which had hitherto been paid out of the Consolidated Fund, must be superannuated. Surely, this was a most wasteful manner of dealing with the funds of the Irish Church. What he most of all objected to, however, in the scheme was the proposed application of a portion of the property of the Church to the permanent endowment of Maynooth—a proposal which, after the Recess would meet with an amount of opposition which the right hon. Gentleman little anticipated. The House had formerly declared against such a proposition, and he hoped they would remain firm to their old convictions. The hon. and learned Member who had last addressed the House had told them that he was an Episcopalian, but no one who had listened to him would have thought that such was the case, seeing that he praised every religious denomination, except the Episcopalian. The hon. and learned Member said that the Presbyterians were badly disposed towards the endowments of the Protestant Church, but he (Mr. Vance) entertained a contrary opinion on the subject. One who was the head of the Presbyterian body, and who was respected by men of every creed in Ireland—the late Dr. Cooke—always defended those endowments. The great majority of his (Mr. Vance's) Presbyterian constituents voted for him, and he believed the majority of the Presbyterians in Ireland voted for those who would support the Church. The hon. and learned Gentleman further stated that as the Irish Parliament had been composed of Episcopalsians they were not competent to enter into such a compact as the Act of Union. But the Parliament of England was at the date of the Union composed of Episcopalsians also. The hon. and learned Gentleman had described the Act of Union as being a mere Act of Parliament, whereas, in truth, it was a solemn compact between the two nations. The Parliament of one of the countries was defunct, and therefore it was impossible that the Parliament of the other could ever take that Act into reconsideration, as to do so would be a breach of faith and a violation of national rights. The right hon. Gentleman at the head of the Government, had stated in one of his speeches that the Act of 1833, the Church Temporalities Act, had interfered considerably with Church property. He denied that such was the case, because there had been precedents for the union of bishoprics from time immemorial, and where any dignities were suppressed by the Act the money so obtained was spent within the Church itself, no part of its property being alienated. The Irish clergy had done nothing to merit the treatment which they were now receiving. The hon. and learned Member for Exeter had said that the Irish clergy might be good country gentlemen, but they made bad parsons. But everybody who was acquainted with the conduct of the Irish clergy knew that they were the most faithful of ministers, and that they devoted themselves with the greatest assiduity to their duties. The existence of a large body of clergy in Ireland was of great national importance, as they formed the connecting link between the gentry and the yeomanry, and possessed the esteem and the confidence of both parties. They were men of high education and refinement, and knit the various classes together wherever they resided. Many landed proprietors were induced to reside in Ireland merely on account of the presence of the clergy, and for every clergyman who left many country gentlemen would also leave. It was vain to say that this Bill would put an end to Irish discontent; it would tend rather to foster and increase it. When once an unjust demand was conceded to clamour, others would be made. Demands for other organic changes would be made, the most prominent of which would be for fixity of tenure and a repeal of the Union, and in resisting those demands the Government would have to depend on the co-operation of those whose feelings they had deeply hurt, whose religious observances they had interfered with, and whose dearest interests they had sacrificed by the destruction of their Church.

MR. RICHARD said, that, as a representative of the Nonconformists in Wales, he wished to make some observations on this measure. The verdict of the Principality had been pronounced upon the Bill with great emphasis, for whereas in the last Parliament it had returned seventeen Liberal Members and fifteen Conservatives, it had at the late election sent twenty-three Gentlemen to support the policy of the Prime Minister, with only ten to adorn the opposite Benches. He was the representative of a constituency, eight out of every ten of whom were Nonconformists; and, as he might fairly describe the Welsh people as a nation of Nonconformists, it would not be thought strange if, in his observations, he regarded the question from a Nonconformist point of view. Not that he had any intention of discussing the abstract question of the justice or expediency of ecclesiastical Establishments. It seemed to him there was no necessity, in these days, for Dissenters to proclaim very loudly their peculiar principles on this subject; inasmuch as there were events and influences which, altogether independently of them, were working that problem to a speedy solution, in the sense in which they looked upon it. All enlightened politicians, of whatever colour in politics, were now accepting this as a just and sound principle—that no body of men, who were good subjects of the State, who were loyal to the Throne, who were obedient to the law, who fulfilled honestly and faithfully their duties as citizens, ought to be placed in a position of inferiority, in comparison with the rest of their fellow-subjects, as regarded their social, civil, and political rights, in consequence of their religious profession. Many of the most learned and pious of the clergy, representing every school of theological thought, were coming rapidly to this conclusion, that the so-called alliance between the Church and the State was injurious, rather than beneficial, to both parties in the alliance; that it was constantly embarrassing the action of the State, while it fettered the freedom, secularized the spirit, and benumbed the vital energies of the Church; and, at the same time, in many ways retarded, rather than promoted, the progress and triumph of practical Christianity in the world. If hon. Gentlemen opposite could not find in their logical arsenal any better weapons wherewith to assail the voluntary system, and to defend the principle of Church Establishments, than those that had been introduced in this debate, he had no fear whatever as to the issue of the controversy. He had heard four remarkable arguments put forward in this discussion, in vindication of Established Churches. One was, that they were necessary as safeguards for religious freedom. It certainly did require some degree of courage to advance that argument in the presence of fifty or sixty Nonconformists who had not forgotten, if the right hon. Gentleman had, that there was no Established Church in the world whose annals were not stained by records of gross cruelties practised upon men who deserved to be called “excellent of the earth,” for no other purpose but to suppress religious liberty. Another argument was that ecclesiastical Establishments were necessary, as a refuge for men of such character and conduct as to render them intolerable to other sects—as a sort of ecclesiastical Alsatia, where outlaws from all other Churches might be received. He did not know how far members of the Episcopal Church might feel flattered by that line of argument, but he should be sorry to think it was a sound one. A third argument was that the Established Church was necessary, in order to enable the high-born of this earth to travel to Heaven in genteel company, and to permit dignitaries to lift their mitred heads in palaces. Another argument was that ecclesiastical Establishments were necessary to repress religious fervour. He quite agreed that if religious fervour was an evil to be repressed, a State ecclesiastical Establishment was the very best wet blanket that could be thrown upon it. When he said that he intended to speak from a Nonconformist point of view, he meant that perhaps he could be able to show that persons belonging to Churches supported by the voluntary principle ought to be able to administer some words of consolation to those friends of the Irish Church who dread the idea of disestablishment and disendowment. He admitted that, if he were placed in the position of a member of the Church, sought to be disestablished and disendowed, he might have a repugnance to the change; and he thought the objection to the change did not arise altogether from the loss of those endowments. He could not think, indeed, that the supporters of the Church Establishment were insensible to the advantage they derived from the artificial support of the law. But he believed it to be an error to assume that any great community of men like those constituting the supporters of the Irish Church, and those benefited by it were actuated by merely base and mercenary considerations. He was also willing to admit that the repugnance to this measure did not arise from a wish on the part of those who opposed the Bill to guard the power and prestige which they now possessed. At the same time, it was not in human nature to be insensible to those advantages. The suspicion that unworthy motives had operated in the case arose from the injudicious nature of the defence put forward for the Establishment in Ireland. For instance—it had been said that if Parliament touched the temporalities of the Irish Church, it would impair the loyalty of the Irish Protestants. They remembered the passage in Scripture—“Doth Job serve God for nought? Put forth now thy hand and touch that which he hath, and he will curse thee to thy face.” That, however, was said not by a friend, but by an enemy. But it had been said of the Irish Protestants, by some injudicious friends—“Put forth your hand and touch their temporalities, and you will see that they will curse you.” He repudiated the idea. He believed their loyalty would remain unchanged. But he wished to say a word in order to encourage those members of the Irish Establishment who desponded as to what might become of their Church in the event of this measure being carried, as it assuredly would be. About a century ago the people of the Principality of Wales were in a state of deplorable spiritual destitution. There had been an Established Church there for upwards of two centuries; but it had utterly neglected the people. The Bishops, and other dignitaries, and many of the clergy were absolutely ignorant of the language of Wales. Simony, nepotism, plurality, non-residence, and an ignorant and immoral clergy; every evil that could affect a Church was rampant in the Church in Wales. Then there arose a body of remarkable men, fired by compassion for their countrymen, and they set a movement on foot calculated to remove the evils that existed. The zeal of those men became offensive to the principal dignitaries of the Church, and an attempt was made to put down their fervour. They were expelled from the communion of the Church, but they were not awed from their purpose. They at once joined the Nonconformists, and commenced the work of evangelizing their countrymen. The hon. and learned Member for Richmond said that the clergy of the Scotch Church had gone out voluntarily, whereas the Irish clergy were to be expelled. But in Wales the clergy were expelled from the Established Church, and took with them no congregations. Well, what happened? In 1742, when that movement occurred, the number of Dissenting places of worship in Wales was 110; but in 1851, a little more than a century afterwards, they had increased to 2,826. The population that year was rather more than 1,100,000; the Established Church provided church accommodation for 301,897, or about 30 per cent; while the Nonconformists provided for 692,339, or 70 per cent. Now, Mr. Horace Mann estimated that if Church accommodation to the extent of 58 per cent of the population were provided that would be sufficient to meet the requirements of the case. In 1851 the accommodation provided by the Established Church fell short of that by 387,672, while the accommodation provided by the Nonconformists exceeded it by 2,770. Therefore the Nonconformists had really provided for the whole population; so that the worst consequence that could happen from any catastrophe occurring to the Church in Wales would be that a few of the landlords and wealthy people who remained attached to the Church of England would have to provide the means of religious consolation for themselves. He wished to correct a mistake made by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for the University of Oxford (Mr. Gathorne Hardy) in a debate on church rates who, in commenting on an illustration of the working of the voluntary system in Wales given to the House by the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Board of Trade, said that the large number of Dissenting chapels in Wales arose from the fact that they were built by speculative builders, who mortgaged them on the security of the pew-rents, and realized 7 per cent. That statement was not correct; but even if it were he did not see how it could affect the case. No doubt the right hon. Gentleman spoke in perfect good faith according to such information as had been supplied to him. The whole thing was a fiction, for chapels were never erected in Wales by building speculators, but were always built by the people, for the people, and out of the money of the people, and were vested in trusts for the congregations which erected them, or for the particular religious bodies to which those congregations belonged. He would now ask the attention of the House to another remarkable fact. What had been the case in Wales since the Census of 1851? Some friends of his had taken the trouble to collect the ecclesiastical statistics of Wales as regarded the Nonconformists for the last eighteen years, and he found that from 1851 to the present year they had built 630 new chapels, and rebuilt and enlarged 786 more, and furnished additional accommodation for 296,000 persons, at a cost of £802,000. Might he not, therefore, with every possible respect, venture to address some words of encouragement to the friends of the Irish Church. If the Welsh — a poor persecuted, struggling people—did so much? ["Oh!"] Yes, persecuted; because from an early part of their history they had been persecuted, and their persecution had not yet altogether ceased —because it seemed to be one of the functions of an Established Church to persecute those who did the work it ought, but had neglected, to do. If a poor, persecuted, struggling people like the Welsh provided so amply for their own religious wants were they to suppose that the Irish Protestants, who as they were told were the most wealthy and the most respectable part of the population, could not manage to get on without the assistance of the State, especially when they were supported, as they certainly would be, by the members of the Established Church in this country? He felt certain that there was not a voluntary Church in the world—and nearly all those now in existence had at one time or another been connected with the State—that would go back to the connection if the offer were made to them. Having once tasted the sweets of freedom, they had no inclination again to enter the house of bondage. He felt certain that twenty-five years hence, if the Irish Church would refuse to take counsel from hon. Gentlemen opposite of going into sulks with the Government — if it accepted its destiny—if it girt itself for the work before it—if it set itself down earnestly to do the work of evangelization—its members would look back with astonishment at the infatuation with which they had hugged their chains, and those who now called the right hon. Gentleman at the head of the Ministry a spoiler and a confiscator, would, in all probability, be engaged in erecting a monument to him in the most honoured place they could find, and inscribing on the pedestal of his statue, "To the man who liberated the Irish Church."

Mr. Richard

LORD CLAUD HAMILTON said, he wished, after the able and amusing speech of the hon. and learned Member for Derry (Mr. Serjeant Dowse), to state why those he represented could not consider the question as one for laughter or merriment. They, on the contrary, regarded it as a grave constitutional question—as an invasion of the rights and privileges which their ancestors had enjoyed for centuries, and which they were justly entitled to hand down to their descendants — and as a policy which, if carried out, would in all probability be fatal to the union of the United Kingdom. As an indication of coming events, he might instance the circumstance that even the hon. and learned Gentleman the Solicitor General in his speech that evening had assumed that peace and order were only maintained in Ireland by the presence of a large alien force, and when comparing Irishmen with Englishmen and Scotchmen had referred to the latter as “aliens.” He could not understand why those who, after all, were the most peaceful, the most industrious, and the most loyal portion of the population of Ireland, who contributed the most largely to the wealth and the industry of the country, should suddenly find themselves under the ban of public opinion, and be held up as fit subjects for spoliation. The hon. Member for Derry assumed, but did not prove, that the Church was the cause of Ireland’s discontent, and that its removal as an Establishment would produce happiness and prosperity, but he prudently abstained from offering any argument to sustain his unfounded assumption. Almost every writer had acknowledged the loyal and industrious character of the population of the North of Ireland. What had they done to justify the wholesale attack that had been made upon them? To ascertain this, examination must be made how the question has obtained its present pre-eminent position. The policy now advocated by the right hon. Gentleman at the head of the Ministry was suddenly undertaken, and did not apparently suggest itself to his mind until the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Kilmarnock (Mr. Bouverie) had taunted him with being a leader who would not lead, and with being at the head of followers who would not follow. A cry was instantly demanded with a view to rallying the Liberal party, and the cry of the Irish Church was suggested as one which had done good service in times past, which had enabled the party to obtain Office in 1835, and to retain it for six years without injury, after all, to the Church. He could not, therefore, look upon this sudden thought as anything but a political and party manoeuvre. It was a mistake to suppose we could repudiate the obligation imposed upon us by the Act of Union. We were not justified in stigmatizing it as a mere Act of Parliament; it was no such thing; it was a solemn arrangement made between two independent Parliaments representing two distinct kingdoms, and the union of the Churches was one of its essential conditions. Without that the Parliament of Ireland would not have passed it; and, if it were said that the Irish Parliament did not represent Ireland, and that therefore it was incompetent to unite the Churches, it was also incompetent to pass the Act of Union; but if the two Parliaments were competent to effect the Union, we were bound by the terms which they agreed to. If they were in existence, they could undo their own act; but by solemn compact they refused to future Parliaments the power to rescind the Act of Union, and they explicitly and solemnly declared no such power should exist. Was it possible to have a more solemn guarantee for the strict maintenance of those terms upon which alone this House had any power in the matter? This was the opinion of the Duke of Wellington, who entreated Parliament not to deviate in the slightest degree from the terms of the compact so long as it intended to maintain the union between this country and Ireland. He said—

“It is the foundation on which the Union rests; it is a compact which you entered into with the Parliament of Ireland, and which you cannot violate without being guilty of a breach of faith.”

He added there could be no deviation from that solemn compact as long as there was a spark of honour left in the country. Lord Plunket, also, who, in his younger days, was the eloquent advocate of Roman Catholic claims in the Irish House of Parliament, and later consistently maintained them in the United Parliament and in the House of Lords, stated in the clearest language, that the existence of the Protestant Establishment was the great bond of judgment—to secure a free Bible and liberty of conscience. Had it not nobly fulfilled these duties under circumstances of great difficulty? The great impediment to the beneficial influence of the Church has always been the unworthy conduct of English ministers who have sought to make it subserve their political objects. As formerly, so now—the interests of religion have been sacrificed to party objects and political intrigue. But has it failed? In England, Wales, and Scotland Dissent has drawn half the whole population from the fold of the Established Church, whereas in Ireland the Church has steadily increased per proportion of population; and had the massacre of 40,000 or 50,000 Protestants in 1641 not taken place, the natural increase of the number would have largely strengthened the Church. But what did they see in America? Tens of thousands of Roman Catholics having emigrated to America became Protestants. In the Tablet, the organ of the Roman Catholics in this country, a Catholic priest stated, some time ago, that at least 1,900,000 persons who had been Roman Catholic in Ireland became members of the Protestant Church in America. And this statement was subsequently confirmed by the Catholic Bishop of Toronto. He claimed these 1,900,000 as fruits of the teaching of the Irish Church. These emigrants obtained the instruction that caused their conversion from the ministers of the Established Church; but dreading the persecution that awaited them in Ireland, they only proclaimed their change of religion when safe in America. There are thousands now in Ireland who would gladly avow their conversion, but are deterred by fear, and not without just cause. This measure, if carried, would sap the very foundation of the rights of property and the Constitution. He called upon the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Board of Trade to explain that portion of his speech which he delivered last year in Scotland relative to the land question, in which he suggested that Protestant absentees should be deprived of their land, and he also called upon the Members of the Government to state whether they concurred in those views. He hoped that the passing of this measure would not cause to be enacted a repetition of the persecution and spoliation that followed the revocation of the Edict of Nantes, which is the only historical event that bears similarity to the present infamous attack on the rights of a loyal, industrious, and religious people.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: The long controversy which has been carried on with regard to the authorship of the letters of Junius is the best proof the public can give of their admiration for that remarkable performance, and I am willing to accept in the same spirit the historical investigation of the noble Lord (Lord Claud Hamilton) who has just sat down with respect to the original idea of the Bill now before us. I think he could not have given us a greater proof of the high estimation which he entertains of our performance. I must leave it to him, however, to arrange the position of the rudder and the figurehead of the ship of State, only entreating him, as I have some interest in the safety of that good ship, that he will not place them side by side. Now, Sir, I will re-call the attention of the House to a thing that I believe has been too much neglected in the course of this debate. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Buckinghamshire (Mr. Disraeli), in the speech with which the debate commenced, very gracefully and very properly, as I thought, exhorted us all on this subject to self-control and mutual forbearance. I must say, however, that the right hon. Gentleman spoilt a little the force of his admonition, because, before he had proceeded a third part in his speech, I took down his words, and I find that he applied rather harsh language to the very innocent Gentlemen who sit on this side of the House, for he accused us of “confiscation,” “plunder,” “robbery,” and “sacrilegious spoliation.” Whether that was meant as a specimen of “self-control and mutual forbearance,” I really do not know, but I must beg to object to the employment of such language from such a quarter. [“Oh, oh!”] Just allow me to state the reason why. In the first place, because it involves a trifling inconsistency on the part of the right hon. Gentleman, but I will not insist on that. In the next place, because, though it might have been quite right to say those things of us before the late election, that language is now not so much levelled at Gentlemen on these Benches as against the majority of the people of England, and, whatever respect we may be entitled to be treated with, I know nothing they have done to forfeit their right to respectful treatment. Then, again, I have another objection, and it is that it is, in fact, begging the question. There is no doubt that this Bill means to disendow the Irish Church, but whether that disendowment be a right and legitimate measure, or whether it be spoliation or sacrilegious robbery, is the very question we come here to argue; and to decide that question in the manner of the right hon. Gentleman, and to apply those epithets as he has done, can serve no purpose except to inflame and envenom a discussion which ought to be calm and statesmanlike. ["Hear, hear!" and "Oh, oh!"] If hon. Gentlemen come here merely to harangue and get cheers from their own party, they cannot do better than use such language; but, if they come here to convince, let me remind hon. Gentlemen that no conviction can be attained unless we start from a common point; and that to assume the greatest turpitude in those that are opposed to you is not the way to prove your case and carry conviction to anyone's mind. It seems to me that the right hon. Gentleman missed a most tempting opportunity for the exercise of that genius which he possesses in so remarkable a degree. This, if anything in the world, is a romantic and historical subject. There is a great deal to be said about the Irish Church; a great deal that is very picturesque, and a great deal that is very interesting. It begins in the night, or, I should rather say, at the dawn of history—in a mythical age; and I should have expected to have heard from the right hon. Gentleman something about

"The fair humanities of old religion,
The power, the beauty, and the majesty"

of the Church. I should have thought he would have favoured us with some sort of sketch of the power and dignity of that Church down to the time of the Reformation—that he would have dwelt on the strong legal title by which it holds its land and possessions, on the frequent recognitions that it has received from Parliament, on the great names that have been connected with it, and that he would have extenuated any faults and shortcomings which he might be compelled to admit by alluding to the special difficulties to which any institution in Ireland is subject. That is what I should have thought would have been suggested to the mind of the right hon. Gentleman by his subject. I should have thought we should have heard the names of Ussher, Bramhall, Taylor, Berkeley, Bedell, Boulter, Swift, Whately, and the other great names which have illustrated the Irish Church. But the right hon. Gentleman, for what reason I know not, entirely declined to take a course of that sort. His speech was so vague that it would have been just as cogent and convincing whether applied to the best or the worst of human institutions. There was no single thing that the right hon. Gentleman said about the Irish Church except these two—first, that it was a Church connected with the State; and secondly, that it was a corporation—and the latter was not strictly accurate. This certainly is a specimen of the high a priori, metaphysical style of reasoning, but I think for an important constitutional question it was rather a hungry and jejune manner of treating it. The right hon. Gentleman's argument may be stated in a few words. The Irish Church, he said, is established—that is, connected with the State. The right hon. Gentleman is favourable to connection between Church and State, and therefore he is in favour of the Irish Church. Of course, he avoided most carefully saying anything more specific about the Irish Church, but that he did say, and upon that he argued. Now, how did he make out his theory of the connection between Church and State? Why, in this way. The right hon. Gentleman has evidently no very high opinion of Churches. But he told us that he was acquainted with many eminent philosophers of the present day, and that, differing in all other points, they all agreed in this, that all speculation tended to "the insoluble," and he told us that it was exactly at that point religion began. Having built the foundations of his Church upon so firm a basis, he proceeded to give his opinion as to the nature of Churches, and this is what he said. He told us that Churches were not calm, were not impartial; that they were sincere, fervid, enthusiastic, with contracted views; and, such being the case, he was of opinion that a union between Church and State was desirable. The State extended to the Church material protection and support, and gained in exchange the power of controlling the Church when it got enthusiastic, fervid, contracted, and all the other things; and then the Church sanctified the actions of the State, and influenced the consciences of men in favour of the powers that be. That was the sketch of the right hon. Gentleman, and it put me in mind of the prayer in the Critic—

“ Assist us to accomplish all our ends,
And sanctify whatever means we use
To gain them.”

Well, I will not quarrel with the definition of the right hon. Gentleman; but what I want to point out is this—that in arguing about the Irish Church we cannot leave the Irish Church out of the question. It follows from his definition that the main advantage which the State gains from the union between Church and State is that it controls the vagaries of the Church and receives a sort of sanctity in return, if the Church be not too weak to make it worth your while to control it; but if, on the other hand, its influence be such that it enlists the conscience of the nation, you are endeavouring to govern against you instead of for you, then, on the very showing of the right hon. Gentleman, it becomes a mischief and ought to be put an end to as soon as possible. Let us apply this reasoning to the case of the Irish Church. Does anybody think that the Irish Church is so dangerous a body that it is necessary for the State to enter into union with it for the purpose of controlling it and keeping it in order? Has it not always been the obedient servant of the State? On this point I will not use my own language, but that which a prelate of our own Church used last year in the House of Lords, when he said that the Irish Church had been “the worst and meanest instrument of English misrule.” [“Name!”] It was the Bishop of Oxford. Is it, then, that the Irish Church sanctifies and consecrates; is it that it throws a halo of sanctity over the acts of the State, and, where law and ordinances and police and military fail, induces a willing obedience to the dictates of the State in the minds of the Irish people? Is that the consideration which the State gets, on the right hon. Gentleman’s principle, or is not the state of the case rather something of this kind — One-eighth of the Irish people may be somewhat conciliated by the union of Church and State, and another eighth may be in some degree conciliated by the Regium Donum; but as to the remaining six-eighths, the Irish Church is an obstacle and a hindrance to the State, and, so far from bringing them into harmony with the Government, sets the great bulk of the nation against it, and multiplies ten-fold the difficulty of governing the country? I am entitled, then, I think, to say that, on the very showing of the right hon. Gentleman himself, the Irish Church does not satisfy the conditions of that union of Church and State on which he rested his argument; that it is not worth controlling; that a union with it is not worth having as an instrument for conciliating and influencing the minds of the Irish people in favour of the Government, but that her influence, as far as it goes, acts rather as a counteracting and disturbing force. Then, the right hon. Gentleman has another argument, which is perfectly consistent with his view of the union of Church and State. He says — “You have two discontented Churches in Ireland now; and if you get rid of this Establishment you will have three discontented Churches.” Would it not be more true to say that you have now one great discontented Church, which you make discontented by endowing this Church; and that if you get rid of this Church you may have the smaller Church discontented, but you will have conciliated the larger one? You may have lost the support of a small clique, but you will have conciliated the nation. I think I have shown—[“No, no!”]—then I intended to show—that on the right hon. Gentleman’s own principle, the union between the Irish Church and the Irish State ought to be dissolved as soon as possible. I now pass on to his other argument, which is equally remarkable. The right hon. Gentleman says the Church is a corporation. It is an aggregate of corporations, as we have often been told; but I will not insist on that. Then he says that the State is the trustee for a corporation, and, being a trustee, cannot apply the money which it holds in trust to its own purposes. Now, what is a trustee? He is a person possessed of property which he holds for the benefit or on behalf of another person. Well, the State is not possessed of this property at all, and therefore it cannot be a trustee. The right hon. Gentleman did not favour us with any demonstration of how he arrived at his conclusion; but I am bound to say that I can quote against it a great authority, a very eminent lawyer, who says that the Bishops and incumbents hold the property which they possess in trust for the whole Church—for the laity and the clergy alike. There is a slight difference between that great authority and the right hon. Gentleman, because the right hon. Gentleman says that the State is a trustee for the Church, whereas the authority I have quoted says that the Church herself is a trustee for other people. Now my authority is Lord Cairns, the leader of the Opposition in "another place." The argument of course, therefore breaks down in the first instance, because the State is not a trustee. There may be other reasons why the State should not appropriate these revenues, but this is not one. I should like, as the right hon. Gentleman accuses us of despoiling corporations and of sacrilegious spoliation, to point out exactly how that matter stands. We do not despoil present corporations, the existing Bishops and clergy, because we compensate them for their lives. [A laugh.] Do hon. Gentlemen think that we do not compensate them? Then whom do we despoil? Who are their successors? [An hon. MEMBER: The laity.] If the hon. Gentleman will please to observe we are now speaking of corporations. The charge of the right hon. Gentleman is that we despoil corporations. Now, we do not despoil, as I have said, but we compensate the present corporations; nor do we despoil those who are unnamed and unknown, and who, if there were no interference, would ultimately succeed them. Therefore, it is quite clear that according to the right hon. Gentleman's own showing we do not despoil corporations. Now, this is all very trifling. It is mere subtleties and waste of time. [Cheers.] I admit it fully. But bear in mind that that is the whole argument of your champion. There was not another word—I defy any Gentleman who may follow me to point it out. There was not a single word that he said about the Irish Church which showed that he knew or cared anything about that Church except that it was an Establishment and that it was a corporation. There are many young Members in this House, and I venture to offer a caution to them: and it is this—they are not to suppose that the right hon. Gentleman cannot speak very differently from that when he chooses. No man can speak more directly to the point than the right hon. Gentleman, or put a case with more force, or grasp it more completely; but sometimes it does not serve his purpose to do that, or to be so cogent and convincing. I observed that, when he had mentioned the word "education," he substituted the word "instruction," and I cannot help thinking that this exhibition of the sort of argument which can be adduced in favour of the Irish Church, and which can with such ease be taken to pieces, was meant as another example of the process of which we have seen so much—the process of political "education," or, if he likes it better, of "instruction." I now turn to the speech of my hon. and learned Friend the Member for Richmond (Sir Roundell Palmer). My hon. and learned Friend, in the position which he occupies on this question, deserves, and I am sure commands, the sympathy of every one in this House for his strict conscientiousness, and I can assure him that if I am obliged to differ from him I do it with the very greatest respect. But it did appear to me that my hon. and learned Friend was much more happy in the tone and feeling which he infused into the debate than in the arguments which he used. ["Oh, oh!"] I will take nothing for granted. I will give my reasons for my opinion. My hon. and learned Friend required information on three subjects. He was ready to consent to disestablishment, but wished it to be shown to him that the disendowment of the Irish Church was necessary, just, and salutary—a most reasonable request. He began by saying that disestablishment did not necessarily involve disendowment. He did not give any proof of that, nor do I think there was any reason why he should; because nothing is more manifest, abstractedly considered, than that the connection between a great corporation and the State could be broken off without depriving it of its revenues. But surely the inconvenience of such a proceeding might easily have presented themselves to the acute mind of my hon. and learned Friend. What would be the effect of the disestablishment of the Irish Church, leaving that Church in the possession of £16,000,000, without any connection with the State, without any of that control which the right hon. Gentleman opposite thinks so necessary, and with absolute freedom to regulate her own affairs in her own way, in a country like Ireland, with no other check except such as might be imposed by a court of law—not by an ecclesiastical court. It seems to me that it would be the foundation of a species of theocracy; with so tremendous a power backed by such enormous wealth, and so utterly unchecked, it is impossible to conceive the amount of disturbance which such an element might introduce. ["Oh, oh!"] Hon. Gentlemen seemed to be going on very fast indeed. They are apparently in favour of a free Church in a free State; but I confess, with my slow rate of progress, that I for one look with horror at the idea of an immense corporation wielding all the formidable power which its money and its position could give it in a country like Ireland. Of course it would either side with the civil Government or it would oppose it. If the two sided together, no doubt they would be irresistible, and therefore it would be worth while for the Government to secure its support by any concessions. But if, on the contrary, the two were arranged as hostile powers, and engaged in quarrelling with each other, would not a vast element of turmoil and confusion be introduced into Ireland? And I would remark that such a thing would involve not a continuance of endowment, but a re-endowment, because the property of the Irish Church was given not by persons who made it a condition that it should continue to be established, but by persons into whose heads it never entered that it would be otherwise than established. If you take away from the Church its connection with the State, you take away its peculiar character, it is essentially a new institution, and the money would be really as much re-invested as if it were given to another body. So much for necessity. I next come to justice, and on that my hon. and learned Friend says that everybody who is in possession of this property is in want of it, and having done nothing to forfeit it, ought to retain it. That is the position which he lays down. The effect of that, of course, would be to make all endowments perpetual. A thing, once done, could not be undone; and however inconvenient, however noxious, however the course of time or the change of circumstances might render it necessary to alter it, you would be met by this rigid and invincible law of property which he lays down, and which it would not be possible to get beyond. As for possession, of course they have that. As to want, everybody wants to keep what he has got. And as for forfeiture, an endowment may be in the highest degree useless and mischievous to a country without the particular owners and occupants of it having done anything to render them in any manner liable to forfeiture. Then my hon. and learned Friend went on to say that the Church had a legal title. If it had not, it would not be necessary to pass a law to take it away. The very foundation of our Bill—one of the very first things we must assume before we pass this Bill—is that there is a legal title, because it is not necessary to invoke the assistance of Parliament to take away property from those to whom it does not belong. Therefore, I do not think that carries it any further. Then my hon. and learned Friend says that every congregation has a vested interest. What is meant by "vested interest?" I was surprised to hear so great a lawyer as my hon. and learned Friend apply the term vested interest in that sense. This is what I understand by a vested interest; and I am open to correction if I am wrong—["Hear!"]—but not before I am wrong. It is this—that where you destroy a College or other institution for public reasons, the persons who have actually got a position in that institution, and have a reasonable expectation of remaining in it, should not suffer for the public good, but should have their position made good for life. But that is not what my hon. and learned Friend contends for. He claims for them as an inalienable right that they should hold their position in perpetuity. But that is not a vested interest. A man has not a vested interest in his own property. The owner of a fee-simple has not a vested interest in the sense in which we use the term, and these people according to him, are just the same. That is to say, they have no legal title at all, and no legal ownership whatever, but they have got a "vested interest," as he calls it; according to him they have an inalienable right, whatever be the circumstances of the time and the necessities for change, and they ought to continue to have the same ministrations in their churches by ministers paid by the State. "No, no!" All I can say is that that is the argument of my hon. and learned Friend. Now, if that be so, I should like hon. Gentlemen to consider this—The State has undoubtedly the power of making, unmaking, modifying, moulding, dispossessing, and endowing corporations. ["No, no!"] Has it not? Having that power, does no responsibility go with it? Can it really be contended, as my hon. and learned Friend contended, that the State is bound to stand by, having the power to correct gross abuses? and to see those abuses exist merely because those who commit them have a legal title or a vested interest? The State may hold its hand and forbear to exercise its power, but it cannot elude the responsibility which waits upon the possession of power, whether exercised or not; and it is for that reason I contend—and in doing so I fear I come under the ban of my hon. and learned Friend—that these public corporations exercising public functions and spending public money are neither more nor less than departments of the State, over which it is the duty of the State to watch just as much as over any other public department. Then my hon. and learned Friend said another thing which astonished me. He said that a monastery was an institution which existed only during the life of the present possessors, so that when the last monk died out the monastery was gone. But, I always thought that, according to the old law of England prior to the dissolution of the monasteries, a monastery was a corporation with a perpetual succession. [Sir ROUNDELL PALMER: I said when it was dissolved.] That is to say, when a monastery ceased to be a monastery it was not a monastery. Well, on that point I quite agree with my hon. and learned Friend. Now, I am very much frightened by this remark of my hon. and learned Friend, because, knowing his great ability and authority, I was afraid he might succeed in instituting a perfectly Chinese system in this country—that anyone, however bad, who got hold of any kind of public property must keep it, and that the State must be engaged like Frankenstein in creating a set of hobgoblins and giants, which it could not unmake, and which would make its life miserable. I was very much relieved by the latter part of his speech, because, after having proved to his own satisfaction first that no disendowment was necessary, and, secondly, that no disendowment would be just, he proceeded to propose to take one-half of the endowment away at once. He proposed, for instance, to take away the estates of the bishops and capitular bodies, and of the Ecclesiastical Commissioners, and the endowments of all the small parishes which have not 200 inhabitants. ["No, no!"] I assure hon. Gentlemen that my hon. and learned Friend really did propose that. My hon. and learned Friend, who is a great Chancery lawyer, laid down a rigid code, and then suddenly wheeled round without the least notice, and after having proved that to take away any endowment was the most wicked thing in the world, he immediately proposed to take away one-half of the endowments. There is a well-known distinction between questions of kind and questions of degree. I can imagine my hon. and learned Friend differing from us as to the quantum of endowment; but how he could argue as he did in favour of absolute rights of property, and the inviolability of corporations, and of congregations who have no legal ownership at all, I cannot understand. My hon. and learned Friend assumed that want was to be our criterion, but how does he proceed? Why he spares the North of Ireland where there are large congregations, and where it is comparatively easy for people to collect subscriptions for the ministers, while he ruthlessly sweeps away small congregations in the South and West of Ireland where there is no such power of raising funds. That is his notion of making want his criterion. He takes away the support of the State where the people are poor and where it is needed, but he leaves it in places where the people are rich and do not need it. That puts me in mind of nothing so much as of Saul, who spared the fat and good cattle, but all that were lean and refuse he utterly destroyed. My hon. and learned Friend is of opinion that the Church will not raise contributions under the voluntary system. What an idea he must have of the value which is set on the ministrations of the Church when he argues that those of its members who are most able to contribute will refuse to do so! My hon. and learned Friend objects to the disendowed Irish Church being compared with the free Churches of other countries. He is driven, therefore, to take up this position. He says that the rich members of the Irish Church will not contribute towards its maintenance, and that, although considerable funds must be necessarily placed at its disposal, it cannot, for a moment, be expected to compete with the Free Church of Scotland, which went out unaided, and in the course of a few years raised up a vast number of schools and churches. Now, if you wish to form the worst opinion possible of the Irish Church, you should listen, not to its enemies, but to the account given of it by my hon. and learned Friend. I will now turn to the right hon. Member for Trinity College (Dr. Ball), of whose speech I must speak with admiration and respect. My right hon. and learned Friend was at great labour to prove what I think he might have assumed—that the end and object of this Bill was to establish voluntaryism in Ireland, and he went on to state his objections to the voluntary system. But does not all this come a little too late? Need we travel through America and Australia to find an answer to his argument? Where is there a country so entirely under the influence of the voluntary system as Ireland herself? When you declaim against the voluntary system you declaim against yourselves. Ireland has got the voluntary system because the Government of England took away from the Irish people the funds which were appropriated for the purposes of their religion. ["No!"] There has been a nation on one side and a Church on the other. ["No!"] Hon. Gentlemen appear to be confused by the term "State Church," but, in point of fact, the State Church in Ireland is not the national Church, and the national Church is not the State Church. Such religious life as there is in Ireland is purely voluntary. If you want to find where religion does not prevail go to where it is richly endowed; for where it does prevail it is poor and needy. Therefore, it is rather too late to urge this objection about voluntaryism. We have made voluntaryism in Ireland, and we cannot unmake it. There is no pretence for saying that we have been generous in framing this measure. I cannot understand being generous with other people's money. We must, however, try to be just. We have laid down a principle, and it appears to me a just one. We say—"We must disestablish and disendow the Church, but we will make a great and important organic change by which not a single man shall suffer injustice;" and as far as we can do so we have wrought out that principle in the Bill. We have contrived to give suum cuique. A great State necessity obliges us to put an end to the Establishment; but we shall take care that persons are not placed in what would be a pitiable situation owing to no fault of their own. And then as to the Church Body. It is complained that we have not attempted to form a New Church Body. I think it would have been very unjust if we had. After withdrawing from the Church her property and her status what right had we to interfere further with her? There is one thing we have left her, and that is freedom to regulate her own affairs. I do not believe that a word would have been said in the Bill about her internal affairs had it not been necessary that a Body should be appointed to receive the proportion of the money which is to be handed over to her. The right hon. Gentleman taunts us with not being able to plunder the Church without her own co-operation. I think he is in error. As far as the harsh and severe part of the Bill is concerned—namely, that relating to disendowment and disestablishment—all that might have been carried out with the most literal exactness without calling for any assistance from the Church, which is only required when we want to remedy, in some degree, the harshness and severity. We want her assistance to constitute a Body to whom we may make over such things as we can properly and reasonably make over in accordance with the plan we have laid down. Then the question really remains, what is the principle on which we ought to act? I do not think it is the principle on which my hon. and learned Friend behind me has based his argument, for the reasons I have stated. We should, in my opinion, look upon the whole subject, not from a legal nor sentimental point of view, but from the most elevated point of view which we can take—that is, as a matter of justice and conscience. The true question we have to consider is, were, or were not, the many made for the few? Is it, or is it not, in accordance with the order of society, and with that principle which secures the prosperity and welfare of nations that a very small portion of the people of a country should monopolize to itself a large share of the public money, to the exclusion of the poorer, and far more numerous, portion of the community? Was it right that the French noblesse should enjoy an exemption from the burden of taxation? If that were wrong, on what principle can it be fairly contended that a certain portion of the Irish people—a small portion—should receive exemption from the charge for the maintenance of religion, which falls so heavily on the members of other denominations in Ireland? This is sometimes represented as a religious question, as if religion could have anything to do with this sort of iniquitous favouritism—the result of conquest, and enforced by violence. Can that which would be wrong in secular matters—which would be intolerable, for instance, in the case of an hospital, that it should be devoted exclusively to the relief of members of one denomination—be right in the case of the most sacred of all things, religion; as if the very fact that, the services to which these funds are applied being religious services did not make it a great deal worse that they should not be dealt with in the most scrupulous fairness on all sides? We are told that we ought to erect a bulwark against Popery, but I would observe that it is no part of the business of a Government to erect bulwarks against any form of Christianity. Of the Roman Catholic religion, it may be said as of the Shannon, that the more bulwarks are set up to stem its course the higher does it rise and the more land does it inundate. I cannot, I think, state my case in fewer or better words than those of Swift, which, to my mind, have peculiar force—

“If God be the sole Lord of conscience, why should the rights of conscience be subject to human jurists?”

This, I hope, Sir, is the beginning of a time when we shall give up not only the idea of persecution, but the language of toleration—that is to say, when we shall come to admit that one man's faith is not a thing to be tolerated by another man, but to be respected, and shall neither impose penalties and disabilities on the one side, nor give bounties on the other, as in this case, to any particular sects; but when we shall obliterate from the statute book and from our minds any notion of social or other superiority as attaching to a man's religion, and when it shall be free for every man to choose his own creed and to walk according to it. There can be doubt, notwithstanding what has been said by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Buckinghamshire, that a man can obtain such certainty in those matters as may be a guide to him through life, and a comfort to him at the hour of his death; but let us at once give up the notion that you can establish an objective certainty in religion, such as a State would be justified in enforcing by penalty or otherwise. I hope to see this change effected, in some degree, by that which we propose to do by means of this Bill. I hope also to see another thing, and that is this—The Irish Church, from the very necessity of its position, is obliged to exaggerate the differences between Roman Catholics and Protestants in Ireland. Its raison d'être is to embody the principle of violent opposition to Rome, and if it were to begin to give up that controversial and polemical attitude, it would feel that, as now constituted, it was sapping its own foundation in the country. I do trust, therefore, that it may be found to be one of the advantages of this measure that that feeling may be put an end to. When there is nothing to fight for, I cannot but hope for peace. But, after all the hard things I have had to say about the Irish Church, I confess my mind is so constituted that I cannot view, without considerable regret, the destruction of an institution which has lasted so many years, and which has been so long interwoven with our history. When that feeling occurred to my mind I returned to that period when a black darkness settled over Ireland in 1692, after the Civil Wars, when she was condemned to suffer all the miseries which the frantic rage of a victorious faction could inflict, and when the most infamous Penal Laws were enacted. If ever a Church had a high mediatorial function offered to it to discharge it was the Church of Ireland at that time. It was connected by race and principle with the victorious party, but as a minister of religion, a professor of a common Christianity, and an avowed

teacher of the doctrine of love, peace, and reconciliation, it had powerful agencies at its command, and should have put these into operation to mediate between the two races. I have sought, however, in vain for any evidence that the Irish Church remonstrated against any of those dreadful Penal Laws. It folded its arms and stood by like the English Parliament, while the Irish Parliament worked its wicked and cruel will. It thus lost a great opportunity of winning to itself, if, indeed, it were possible to do so, the hearts of the Irish people. That opportunity returned again, when the English Government, alarmed at last, did tardy justice to the Roman Catholics of Ireland by the Emancipation Act. The Irish Church might then have stood forward and emancipated itself from the narrow prejudices by which it had so long been trammelled, but it declined to do so. It had a last chance of redeeming its position and obliterating religious dissensions afforded it when Mr. Stanley, with a liberality which did him infinite credit, introduced his scheme for mixed Irish education. But how did the Irish Church receive that scheme? It stood aloof. It took an attitude of hostility. It set up a small useless competition of its own against the Government plan, and for once in its life succeeded in uniting the bigots of all other denominations in the endeavour to stifle this noble work. That was its last chance, for it seems to me that it thus cut itself off from all sympathy with the nation, and that nothing was wanting but the fulness of time to bring about the fate which now threatens it. Mr. Burke, whom the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for the University of Dublin (Dr. Ball) quoted as a high authority on this subject, speaks in one of his letters of the Irish Church as being a great and grievous infliction on the Irish people, who had to bear the cost of two religious Establishments—one which they do believe in and another in which they do not. This, however, Mr. Burke went on to say, was unalterable. At that time I do not know how any man could have said otherwise; the conditions of society were then such that it was vain to look for a change. But the conditions of society are now altered. The minds of men have become enlightened. They see things now no longer through the haze of prejudice and bigotry which surrounded them in the last century, but in a better and purer light. The present state of things in Ireland is no longer unalterable. We can alter it, and we will.

MR. WALPOLE moved the adjournment of the debate.

MR. GREENE objected to the adjournment at so early an hour of the evening, as there were many Members on both sides who had not yet spoken. They had not yet come to the practical question before them. He had been a Member of the House since 1865, and he could safely say this question had never been made a prominent question until the right hon. Gentleman the First Lord of the Treasury found himself in Opposition, and found also that it was difficult to unseat the Conservatives without bringing that question forward. The measure was fraught with dishonesty, and the country had not yet given its voice upon it. Hon. Members should be allowed to go again to their constituents upon this Bill. It was said that the Roman Catholics of Ireland felt the Irish Church as a grievance. Now, as Protestants, they protested against the errors of Rome, but the First Lord of the Treasury was now asking them to degrade the Protestant Church at the bidding of Romish priests. It was all very well for hon. and right hon. Gentlemen on the opposite side to say—"The old cry of 'No Popery' is not now uttered," but he was one of those who would say "No Popery." It was said in the debates last year that the Irish farmers would not go for disestablishment: then they should be deducted from the Roman Catholic and added to the Protestant population. Absenteeism was complained of, but this Bill would produce it in ten-fold greater amount. The voluntary system must fail in Ireland, and there was no analogy between Scotland and Ireland, for the people who left the Scotch Church were wealthy people. And then it should be remembered that Scotland was a purely Protestant country. He did not believe that the voice of the country was in favour of this measure, and the Bill was not in accordance with the previous speeches of the right hon. Gentleman. He used to look with satisfaction and delight upon the fact that there was a man of such talent as the right hon. Gentleman

to lead the Opposition. He did not blame the right hon. Gentleman for changing his opinions, but was the man who changed his opinions on all questions the man to lead the country? Much had been said about Irish discontent. But the Irish Church had never before been brought prominently forward as the cause of that discontent, and the hon. Member for Cork, in 1867, had touched very lightly upon it, dealing chiefly with the land question. ["Read!"] No, he was happy to say that in the few remarks he should make he was not obliged to read, like an hon. Gentleman who had lately been returned to Parliament, and who read nearly all his speech. This Bill had not been asked for in Ireland. They were told that the hon. Member for Bradford (Mr. Miall) was the man to enlighten them all on this subject, but all that hon. Gentleman had done was to hand about a butter-boat. He for one would not entertain the Bill at all. Though hon. Gentlemen on the other side thought they could do everything because they had a majority, and told them they must accept the Bill, he would not accept it at all. The lame speech just made in its favour by the Chancellor of the Exchequer showed clearly that he had a bad case. As for the speech of the hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for Richmond (Sir Roundell Palmer), it should be circulated throughout the length and breadth of the land. It was said that the subject was exhausted; but the question had only now begun to be debated, and he recommended hon. Members on his side of the House not to divide to-morrow, for only about thirty out of 658 Members had yet had an opportunity of talking. He thanked the House for the kindness with which they had listened to him; for he remembered that on a former occasion they had refused to hear him. Many quotations had been made in the course of the debate from the former speeches of hon. and right hon. Gentlemen, but he objected to such a mode of discussion. For his part he believed that a man ought every year to wipe out everything he had said or done the year preceding. They had heard a few nights ago a quotation from something the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Buckinghamshire (Mr. Disraeli) had stated when he was a lad. No real advantage could be gained by citing such passages. He (Mr. Greene) was not deeply versed in the history of the Irish Church, but he had studied quite enough of it to be satisfied that what they were about to do was as great a robbery as ever was committed. [Laughter.] That was his honest conviction, as well as that of the greater part of the people of England. Had Ireland been pacified, even temporarily by the promise of this measure which they now boastfully declared they were about to pass, but which would not pass? Perhaps the House might remember his prediction that the Reform Bill of the right hon. Gentleman opposite would not pass, and it did not. Who could trust a Government which let loose the Fenians—men who had been guilty of the foulest crimes—without any guarantee for their future conduct? Such a proceeding was enough to induce him to move a Vote of Want of Confidence himself. The day of retribution was at hand, and they might rely upon it that in the course on which they had entered Ministers would not be borne out by thoughtful and right-minded people in this country.

Motion agreed to; Debate further adjourned till To-morrow.

EDUCATION—SCHOOLS FOR CHILDREN OF THE WORKING CLASSES.

QUESTION.

MR. BAINES said, he wished to ask the Vice President of the Committee of Council on Education, Whether it is intended, in the Return of "Schools for the Poorer Classes of Children," ordered to be made from the Municipal Boroughs of Birmingham, Leeds, Liverpool, and Manchester, to include all Schools for the Children of the Working Classes, and especially whether the Return will include Private Schools, Night Schools, the Schools and Classes of Mechanics, and similar Institutions, and Sunday Schools?

MR. W. E. FORSTER said, in reply, that if his hon. Friend would refer to the Return for which he had moved, he would find that it included all the schools in which the fee was under 1s., and that would include all schools for the children of the working classes. But the Return was also intended to include schools for the children of those who unfortunately did not work, either because they could not or did not wish to find work—namely, ragged schools; and it was especially the object of the Government that the Return should include private schools, night schools, schools of mechanics' institutes, and similar institutions, and, in fact, all week-day schools. It was not intended to include Sunday schools, not from any feeling that they were not most useful institutions, but because the object of the inquiry was to find out the amount of secular education. They could hardly empower the Government Inspectors to examine schools at which religious instruction only was given.

IRELAND—FENIAN CONVICTS.

QUESTION.

SIR GEORGE JENKINSON said, he wished to ask the Chief Secretary for Ireland, Whether his attention has been directed to the nature of the proceedings at a banquet held at Cork on the 17th instant, in honour of the released Fenian Convicts, and presided over by the Mayor of that city, and to the language used at that meeting by John Warren, just released from a fifteen years' sentence, and whether these proceedings have been referred to the Law Officers of the Crown, or if other proceedings are contemplated; whether the Government have received any information as to words used at a meeting at Ballinasloe by another released Fenian Convict, Augustine Costello, released from a twelve years' sentence, and who said, at the meeting referred to "That he would, as long as he had breath, conspire and plot against the English Government;" and, whether these and the other released Fenian Convicts have been released unconditionally, or whether they receive their pardon subject to any condition as to their future behaviour? He wished also to ascertain from the right hon. Gentleman whether the number of Fenians enumerated in the Return on the subject have been released; if not, how many of them have; and, whether it is proposed that any of the Convicts in Australia shall be brought home at the public expense?

MR. CHICHESTER FORTESCUE: Sir, I have to state, in answer to the hon. Gentleman, that it is true that language of a seditious nature has been used at Cork and Ballinasloe by the two discharged Fenian convicts mentioned in his Question, and they are the only two, so far as I am informed, who have so grossly and disgracefully abused the clemency of the Crown. These proceedings have, of course, attracted the attention of the Government, who referred them to the Law Officers of the Crown, under whose consideration they are at the present moment. I may, however, add that, while I would venture to caution the hon. Baronet against attributing exaggerated importance, as it is quite possible to do, to the mischievous eloquence of those persons, I wish to say that the Government are by no means indifferent to these proceedings, and that we are quite determined such things shall not be permitted to continue. I have to state further that, after very careful consideration of that particular point, the Fenian convicts did not receive free pardons, as was done in the case of the Chartists in this country, but were discharged without conditions, our deliberate opinion being that we were not discharging any person on whom it would be worth while to make the attempt to impose those conditions. In reply to the last Question of the hon. Baronet, I have to say that the number of convicts mentioned in the Return which has been laid before Parliament will be discharged, and as to the conveyance back to this country of any of these convicts who happen to be in Australia, I may observe that I answered a similar Question on a former occasion, when I stated that the Government had no present intention of adopting that course, while they held themselves free to consider any particular case on its individual merits. I wish to take this opportunity of stating that I have observed in a leading journal this morning an assumption that two of the Fenian convicts—namely, O'Donovan Rossa and Luby—had been discharged, and were included in the list of those to whom the clemency of the Crown had been extended. That is a mistake. They are not included in that list.

IRELAND—THE MAYOR OF CORK. QUESTION.

MR. HENRY said, he would beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury, If there is any truth in the statement made by the Mayor of Cork at a banquet held in that city on the 17th of March, in honour of the released Fenian Convicts, and presided over by the Mayor, and at which meeting he was reported to have used the following words:—"That they had Mr. Gladstone on their side, who, he felt confident, would release the rest of the Fenian prisoners;" and if there was any foundation in fact for that statement?

MR. GLADSTONE: As I learn, Sir, from the Question of the hon. Member that the Mayor of Cork has said "he felt confident that Mr. Gladstone would release the rest of the Fenian prisoners," I conclude, therefore, that there is some truth in his statement, because I cannot deny that the Mayor of Cork may feel confident on that subject. With respect to the other part of the Question—whether there is any foundation, in fact, for the statement of the Mayor of Cork—I have only to say that Her Majesty's Government have formed no intention to release any more of the Fenian prisoners.

THE CADASTRAL SURVEY.—QUESTION.

SIR LAWRENCE PALK said, he would beg to ask the Secretary of State for War, When the Cadastral Survey of the mining districts of England will be completed, and especially the mining districts of Devon and Cornwall, where there are the richest mines of tin, copper, and other ores?

MR. CARDWELL said, in reply, that the cadastral survey of the mining districts had been commenced in Flint, Cheshire, Derbyshire, and Denbighshire, but not in Devon or Cornwall, and the time at which it would be completed there, would depend on the order in which it would proceed in the rest of the mining districts, including Staffordshire and South Wales.

Mr. Chichester Fortescue

BRIDGWATER ELECTION.—QUESTION.

MR. LANGTON said, he wished to ask Mr. Attorney General, Whether he intends to recommend that a Commission should be sent to Bridgwater to inquire into the corrupt practices which the Judge reported to have extensively prevailed at the last Election; and, whether he intends to prosecute those whose names were mentioned in the Judge's Report?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL said, in reply, that he intended to move an Address to the Queen for a Commission to inquire into the alleged corrupt practices at Bridgwater. In regard to the prosecution of those persons whose names were mentioned in the Judge's Report, that point was now under consideration.

TRANSFER OF LAND.—QUESTION.

MR. T. CHAMBERS said, he would beg to ask Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, When the Report of the Transfer of Land and Middlesex Registry Commission, of which he is a member, will be ready; and whether provision cannot be made to obviate the necessity for the references in the ordinary business of registration to a Judge of the Court of Chancery, provided for by "The Transfer of Land Act, 1862," and the multiplication of hearings and appeals consequent on such references?

MR. STANSFELD said, in the absence of his right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer, he would beg to state that, as the Report was in draft and not yet agreed upon, it would be premature to make any statement as to the provisions that would be recommended.

THE SANITARY ACTS.—QUESTION.

LORD EUSTACE CECIL said, he would beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department, If it is his intention to introduce, during this Session, a Bill to consolidate the various existing Sanitary Acts, or to reconcile the conflicting Clauses in some of them, especially with reference to the powers and duties of governing bodies of Special Drainage Districts, formed by order of the Secretary of State under the Acts of 1867 and 1868?

MR. BRUCE, in reply, said, it was not his intention this Session to introduce a Bill to consolidate the Sanitary Acts, although he quite admitted that the subject was one worthy the attention of the Government. In answer to the latter part of the Question, he hoped to be able to bring in a short Bill promoting the union of districts for sanitary purposes, so as to solve the doubts and difficulties which surrounded that part of the question.

CLERGY IN THE WEST INDIES.

QUESTION.

MR. CRUM-EWING said, he wished to ask the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies, Whether, in view of the approaching expiry of the Jamaica Clergy Act, he will lay before Parliament a Statement of the amount paid out of the Colonial Revenues for Ecclesiastical purposes, together with the religious statistics of the Island; and, whether he will lay before Parliament similar information regarding the whole of the other West India Colonies and British Guiana?

MR. MONSELL, in reply, said, there would be no objection to produce these Returns.

AGRICULTURAL STATISTICS.

QUESTION.

MR. READ said, he wished to ask the President of the Board of Trade, When the Agricultural Statistics will be collected this year; if Horses will be included in those Returns; and, if any other attempt will be made to render those Returns more comprehensive and complete, especially with regard to Live Stock; also, the estimated cost of those Statistics, and the amount of Postage included in that sum; and, why two separate Returns in 1866 cost £10,000, while only one in the following year cost £18,000?

MR. BRIGHT: Sir, it is the intention of Government to collect the statistics on the same day as in previous years, the 25th of June. I believe it is not intended to take any returns of horses, for a reason which I am very sorry to state; it is, that the farmers are understood to suspect, if anything is asked about horses, that it is intended to bring upon them assessed taxes. I hope this is not true—and if it is not, I know no reason why Horses should not be included—but I understand that is the reason why they have been hitherto excluded. There is great difficulty in the work which has already been undertaken, but the Board of Trade will be very glad to listen to and consider any suggestions which can be offered to them with a view to make the Returns more complete. As to the expenditure, I understand that last year the Returns were made by no fewer than 530,000 occupiers of land and owners of live stock; and not fewer than 2,400 revenue officers were employed in collecting the facts. That work was much more extensive than was expected, and much more costly; and the Inland Revenue Department this year ask for a Vote of £12,000 for the purpose of collecting the agricultural statistics. With regard to the latter part of the Question of the hon. Gentleman, the two Returns of 1866 included live stock and acreage collected at different periods, and the cost, including postage, which was £10,000, was a sum of £21,000. The postage is not an actual charge, because it is a matter of account between one Department and the other. The united Returns of 1867 cost £18,000. There is great difficulty in making out these Returns with any accuracy, and the Board of Trade will be extremely glad if the hon Member can give them any suggestion which would enable them to do what they undertake more accurately.

MR. READ said, he wished to know whether the estimate of £12,000 included postage?

MR. BRIGHT said, that the £21,000, in 1866, included postage, and so did the £18,000 in the succeeding year; but the £12,000 would not include postage.

ARMY—THE MILITIA—THE SNIDER RIFLE.—QUESTION.

MR. COLLINS said, he would beg to ask the Secretary of State for War, Whether it is the intention of the War Office to supply the Snider Rifle to all the Militia Regiments for this year's training; and, if to any, to what Regiments, and upon what principle such distribution will take place?

MR. CARDWELL said, in reply, that twenty-four regiments of Militia would be furnished with the Snider Rifle, the whole number of men so armed being 16,789. The principle on which the selection had been made was this—Those regiments had been chosen which were either going to Aldershot or to Shorncliffe, or which within the last three years had most systematically devoted themselves to rifle practice. Four regiments were in the first category—namely, the 3rd Royal Middlesex, the 5th Royal Middlesex, the 3rd Royal Surrey, and the West Kent. Twenty regiments were in the other category—namely, the Bedford Light Infantry, the 1st Royal Cheshire Light Infantry, the 2nd Royal Cheshire, the Cornwall Rangers, the 1st Derby, the 2nd Derby Rifles, the East Essex Rifles, the East Kent, the Royal Glamorgan, the 5th Royal Lancashire, the Royal North Lincoln, the Royal Monmouth Light Infantry, the Royal Radnor, the Royal Wiltshire, the Worcester, the Royal Aberdeen Highlanders, the Queen's Edinburgh Light Infantry, the Inverness Highland Light Infantry, the Royal Perth Rifles, and the Ross Highland Rifles.

SALMON FISHERY BILL.—QUESTION.

MR. LIDDELL said, he wished to ask the Under Secretary of State for the Home Department, What progress has been made in the preparation of a Bill to amend the Salmon Fishery Laws of 1861 and 1865; and when he proposes to introduce such Bill?

MR. KNATCHBULL - HUGESSEN said, in reply, that since a deputation had waited on him upon this subject he had been the fortunate recipient of much correspondence relating to it, and had been endeavouring to mature a measure for the amendment of the Salmon Fishery Laws of 1861 and 1865. At present he could give no more satisfactory answer than that he would endeavour to lay a Bill on the table at an early period.

IRELAND—RUMOURED RESIGNATION OF THE LORD LIEUTENANT.

QUESTION.

MR. VANCE: Sir, I wish to ask the First Lord of the Treasury, Whether there is any truth in a rumour which I have seen with much regret—namely, that Lord Spencer has tendered his resignation as Lord Lieutenant of Ireland?

MR. GLADSTONE: I have no communication whatever to make to the hon. Gentleman and to the House on the subject. I have no reason to suppose that there is any truth in the rumour.

Mr. Cardwell

IRISH CHURCH BILL—[BILL 27.]

(Mr. Dodson, Mr. Gladstone, Mr. John Bright, Mr. Chichester Fortescue, Mr. Attorney General for Ireland.)

SECOND READING. ADJOURNED DEBATE.

[FOURTH NIGHT.]

Order read, for resuming Adjourned Debate on Amendment proposed to Question [18th March], "That the Bill be now read a second time;" and which Amendment was, to leave out the word "now," and at the end of the Question to add the words "upon this day six months."—(Mr. Disraeli.)

Question again proposed, "That the word 'now' stand part of the Question."

Debate resumed.

MR. WALPOLE: Sir, after the remarkable character of this debate, which has already been prolonged for three nights, and especially after the speeches of the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for Dublin University, (Dr. Ball) and of my hon. and learned Friend the Member for Richmond (Sir Roundell Palmer), I feel it would be unjustifiable in me to make any lengthened observations, which, under other other circumstances, I should possibly have done, on the question before the House. I therefore propose to confine myself solely to the important principles involved in the Bill. This measure was described, on its first introduction, as the most grave and arduous work of legislation ever submitted to the House of Commons, and I think it deserves that character. What are we invited by the Government to do? We are invited for the first time in English history—and, with one exception, I believe I might say for the first time in the history of Christendom—to do away with the religion of the country as a national religion, and thus to make what I think I may call a legislative revolution in our fundamental laws, upon that which is one of the most important of subjects—one of those subjects that are most dear to the convictions and feeling of a religious people. I have said that this is the first time in our history such a measure has been proposed. There may have been times, some of which were alluded to last night by the hon. and learned Member for Richmond, when disestablishment and disendowment were partially, and for a short period, carried into effect; but I know of no time when either the one or the other has been attempted except on occasions of what I may call rebellious anarchy, such as no one would desire to apply to the present state of things; or unless the trust on which the Church was founded, and the trust on which its property was given, had been so much abused and perverted as to call for the interference of the State. The right hon. Gentleman the President of the Board of Trade (Mr. Bright), in that most powerful and remarkable speech which we heard the other night, reminded us of a saying of Wycliffe, that "when endowments are abused Princes may take them away." And he added thereto an aphorism of his own—that when endowments are mischievous Parliament may divert them to other uses. I will not dispute either of those sayings, for, on the contrary, I believe in both of them, but I take them as the test by which I to contend that you cannot justify the passing of this measure on only such grounds; and, in the absence of any such justification, I venture to call a measure of this kind a legislative revolution. Now, I do not say that a legislative revolution is necessarily a bad thing. It may be either a good thing or a bad thing, according to circumstances, and in the present case I wish to try the question by the only test which it can be tried by—namely, by asking myself and the House this question—From what does such a revolution arise, and to what is it likely to lead us? We have had legislative revolutions in this country—revolutions in government and revolutions in religion. We had a revolution at the time of the Reformation. We had a revolution when we excluded the House of Stuart from the Throne. But from what, and to what, on those occasions did these revolutions tend? The revolution at the Reformation brought us from foreign interference, and what we believe to be corrupting errors, to national independence and Protestant purity of faith and worship. The revolution which took place when the House of Stuart was excluded from the Throne brought us from lawless usurpation and invaded liberty to responsible government and constitutional freedom. On both occasions, when we ask ourselves from what, and to what, did those revolutions tend, we find there was everything to justify them and nothing, in my opinion, to find fault with them. But let us ask ourselves the same question with reference to this measure—from what, and to what, is it likely to lead? On the two occasions to which I have referred there was no destruction of anything which formed part of our national system. They were Reformations and Restorations. But this is to a certain extent a measure of destruction. It violates fundamental laws. It invades prescriptive rights. It abolishes institutions hitherto deemed essential to the well-being of the community. Now, I will endeavour to apply my test to this measure, and I will apply it to both the objects which it proposes—disestablishment and disendowment; and as my hon. and learned Friend the Member for Richmond applied an adjective to the latter of those objects, I will take the liberty of adding an adjective to the former, because I think it will more fully illustrate the argument I wish to press upon the House. My hon. and learned Friend added "universal" to disendowment, and the adjective I would add is "entire" to disestablishment. I shall speak of entire disestablishment and "universal disendowment." My hon. and learned Friend the Member for Richmond supports the measure upon the first principle involved in it—namely, entire disestablishment; but he objects to the measure with reference to the other principle it involves—universal disendowment. But why does he draw that distinction? As far as I can follow him—and he spoke so clearly that it was impossible not to follow him on every point—his reason for supporting the measure with reference to disestablishment was this—it was so important to give satisfaction and peace to Ireland that he would willingly remove all those symbols and tokens of civil superiority and political ascendancy which are in any way connected with the character of an Establishment. Well, that is an intelligible ground; and if disestablishment were confined to that point, and to that point only, I can understand why my hon. and learned Friend supported that portion of the Bill. But there are circumstances involved in an Establishment which are not necessarily connected either with civil superiority or political

ascendancy; and if those circumstances are going to be destroyed, the independence and power of the people is destroyed and their rights. I say my learned Friend's Friend ought not to be so far from his common sense as to support the first part of this Bill as well as the second part. Now, in order to answer this question, let me ask what does an Establishment imply? It implies, in the first place, a particular organization by which the State secures to the people the continuance of religion and personal superintendence. It implies, in the second place, a particular expression in order that the benefits so intended to be secured to the people should not only be universal but permanent. It implies, in the third place, a rule of doctrine and a form of worship which the clergy and laity have equally agreed upon, and which ought not, therefore, to be taken away till the clergy and the laity agree so to do; and it implies, in the last place, the supremacy of the Crown as a guarantee for the good government of the Church, and as a further guarantee against any ecclesiastical usurpation, whether it comes from abroad or whether it originates at home; and this supremacy is, in fact, made manifest partly by the creation, of rights inherent in the Crown alone, that is to say, of sees and dioceses; partly by the appointment of Bishops to have the charge over those sees and dioceses, and partly by supporting the supremacy of the law which secures the faith so protected through the instrumentality of your own tribunals. If that be a fair description of what Establishment implies, it is perfectly obvious that a great many of those things do not touch either civil superiority or political ascendancy; and when it is necessary to preserve an Establishment for these things, I think my learned Friend went too far when he said that he could support the whole of the first part of this Bill, involving as it does the removal of many circumstances connected with your Church, which are, in fact, necessary for the maintenance of the Church itself. What does the Bill do in all those particulars? One portion of the Bill dissolves every corporation, aggregate or sole, and effectually puts an end to parochial organization; it takes away all the property of the Church and vests it in Commissioners, so that what was intended to give a permanent tenure to any parish may be taken away from it without any substitution of any equivalent being provided. Another portion of the Bill deprives the Crown of the right of appointing Bishops: and that part of the Bill is so connected with Clause 21, which constitutes a New Governing Body, that it deprives the laity of the Church, in my humble opinion—all I know what the new government is to be—of the true guarantee they have always had for preserving the doctrine, discipline, and worship of their Church. If that be so, what are the consequences which such a change must necessarily involve? The moment you pass this Bill, if a vacancy occurs in any benefice, and somebody is not ready and willing to supply means of his own for the purpose, so that it cannot be filled up, the congregation belonging to the church of that parish will be deprived of rights enjoyed for three centuries. Nor does it stop there; for unless you suppose the endowments you are going to take away to be casually replaced, there is nothing in the Bill to insure the continuance of the religious ministrations which that parish now possesses, and when you have taken away all the property of the Church that parish must rely entirely upon voluntary contributions to make good the spoliation which has deprived it of its property. But the strong point in my mind is the change which the Bill will effect as to the severance of the Royal supremacy from the Church of the country, and therefore removing that control which has been found necessary, and, I believe, will be found necessary, to the continued freedom of the Church. It is through that supremacy, and through that alone, that your doctrines and worship have been preserved. Through that supremacy, and through that alone, that, to a certain extent, innovations, and to a still further extent Ritualism, have been, and may be checked. Through that, and through that alone, a barrier is reared against the introduction into the Church of sceptical rationalism, on the one hand, or sacerdotal intolerance on the other. Now, Sir, the answer which is given to the objections that may be taken to this part of the Bill is two-fold. First, it is said—"There is a new body provided which will take care of these matters as well as they have been taken care of by the supremacy of the Crown." My answer is that the new body is such a shadowy substance at present, that I cannot judge what powers it will have, or how far it will exercise them to meet the difficulty I am pointing out. And my second answer would be that I doubt very much whether you can substitute such a new body as will effectually secure the same guarantees as we now possess. But then it is said—"Give freedom to the Church, and then your Church will do as other free Churches have done; all your difficulties will be met by the increased enthusiasm which you will excite among the people." The answer to that point given by my hon. and learned Friend the Member for Richmond last night was so powerful and so succinct that I will not weaken it by adding much of my own. But I supplement it to this extent, that I value freedom in ecclesiastical and temporal matters not less than any Gentleman in this House. I believe that freedom can do a great deal; but I also believe that the most perfect freedom you can give the Church, unaided and unassisted, will never meet all the difficulties by which you are surrounded. There are three Churches now in Ireland, and yet the ministers of those Churches, with all the appliances to meet the difficulties with which they are surrounded, and with all the activity to spread their own doctrine and discipline, are still insufficient to penetrate the dark recesses of ignorance and vice which, unhappily, exist around them. Take away one of those Churches, cripple its resources, curb its influence, and ignorance and vice will be added to more and more. No one can believe that ignorance or vice ever did or ever will seek, by its own aid, instruction from without or correction from within. I have quoted before in this House an observation of Dr. Chalmers, but I may be pardoned for citing again a remark that is as beautiful as it is true. Dr. Chalmers said that "Christianity must go forth in quest of human nature—for human nature unenlightened and un instructed, would never go forth in quest of Christianity." Try the principle on a kindred subject. If anything would convince you that the mere voluntary principle cannot grapple with all its difficulties, let us see what has happened in the case of education.

The voluntary principle is that on which we have all been endeavouring to rely for the education of the people; but we have aided it by large contributions from the State. What is the result? Those who have been the greatest advocates of the voluntary principle are now becoming the greatest advocates of compulsory rates for building schools, and even of the compulsory attendance of the children. If, then, the voluntary principle has failed with reference to education, I fear it will also fail if that is the only thing to which you trust for preserving religion among our people. The conclusion, therefore, to which I come on this portion of the Bill is this—that disestablishment, although it might possibly be sanctioned to the extent to which it might remove any complaint on the ground of civil superiority or political ascendancy, ought not to be touched or shaken in the least degree when that Establishment is required for the maintenance of religion. I turn now to the question of disendowment, and here my hon. and learned Friend (Sir Roundell Palmer) has so grappled with and mastered the whole subject that it saves me from making any remarks that one might otherwise be tempted to urge to the House. There are, however, a few observations which occur to me on this subject, and firstly, in consequence of the very singular speech which we heard last night from the Chancellor of the Exchequer. The speech was so unsatisfactory as to make me desirous to offer to the House a few remarks upon it. If I understood him aright, he had the boldness to assert that the Government were only making new regulations which could not inflict injury on anyone. Now, let us examine that saying of the right hon. Gentleman. What is done by the Bill? You cannot deny, at any rate, that there is a forcible seizure of all the property of the Church, and the abnegation of all prescriptive rights to that property, without any pretence or allegation, and certainly without any proof that that property has been in any respect so perverted and abused that it ought to be taken away. And, having seized the property, what are you going to do with the produce of the property—as it will be called on that side of the House, and which we on this side of the House may be permitted to call, without being reprimanded—the spoil to be derived from that property? First of all you considerately say that the Church may still retain the fabrics, but on the condition that it undertakes to support them. These churches have now, at this moment, a fund set apart for the sustentation of the fabrics, and that fund you are going to take away, and having taken it away, you say you are going to leave us possession of the churches, but on the condition that we support them. And then my right hon. Friend says that this is doing an act which does injury to no one. Then, what are you going to do with glebe houses? You indulgently leave them the property of the rectors, and on what condition? On this condition, that they buy them back again by purchasing the site on which they stand. This is a most considerate and condescending way of dealing with the owners of these glebe houses which have had so much money expended on them out of the savings of those who inhabit them, that I believe they have bought them ten times over. What do you do with the residue of the great bulk of the Church property? You divide it into three parts, and you say that you will convert, for the purpose of vested interests, a certain portion into terminable annuities; but as these will be exhausted one after another as lives fall in, you make no provision for the congregations attending those churches, and who are really the persons entitled to the benefit of those churches, of which the clergy, to whom you are going to give the terminable annuities, are simply and solely the trustees. And yet you say that in doing that by which you deprive the congregations of their churches, of the means of religious instruction they have hitherto possessed, you inflict injury on no one. With wonderful inconsistency you deal in a different manner with the Presbyterians and the Roman Catholics. You capitalize their incomes in order that they may possess that permanent endowment which you deny to the Church. I will not say that is done in order to deprive the Church of its endowments and means of worship, but you do it in a manner which has that effect. I now turn to the third portion of the fund—to that portion which the President of the Board of Trade calls surplus property. What are you going to do with that? You are going to divert it from the purpose for which alone it was originally given to other purposes, which, however beneficial they may be, are not the purposes of the original donors. Then hon. Members have heard a great deal on the subject of corporation and corporate funds. One would have thought in listening to these remarks that the mere circumstance of all these rectories being so many corporations is a reason why you are entitled to deal with the property of those corporations just as you wish. On what basis such a proposition rests I do not know. You may say that the State has a right to resume and to deal with this property. According to the principle of the ablest jurists and the profoundest Statesmen that ever lived, no such right has ever been recognized, and I hope never will be recognized, as that the State may seize hold of any property of that kind. The State is the guardian and regulator of this kind of property, but not its proprietor. The State has a right to lay down rules, to give directions, to prescribe conditions, on which any and all property, including the property of corporations, may be acquired, held, enjoyed, alienated, disposed of, and transmitted, either by purchase or descent. But if those rules, directions, and conditions are once complied with, then, as soon as any parties, whether individuals or corporations, possess the property, according to these rules, directions, and conditions, nothing can entitle you, either in reason or in justice, to take it away, unless you can show that the property has been so perverted and abused that the State has a right to resume it. Sir, I have heard it said that there is a distinction between the property in this case and other corporate property, inasmuch as it came to the Church by conquest and by wrong. [Ministerial cheers.] Hon. Members on the other side cheer that observation. Whether it has come to the Church by conquest and by wrong would embark us upon too long an argument at the present moment. But whether the consequence which you intend to draw from that proposition follows is a matter which I think may be very shortly disposed of. What does all prescription mean but a right to hold property which, for long periods of years, has been held by any person without challenge? Last Session we had in this House one who is not now among us—a great thinker and a great Liberal—one not unfriendly to those among our Irish fellow-countrymen who would desire to legislate with regard to Ireland in a way which those upon this side of the House might not always approve, would he have encouraged the holding of a doctrine such as I have adverted to about a title by conquest and by wrong? In a pamphlet on the subject of England and Ireland he told you what is the real truth in regard to the case, that the property of Ireland—I am not speaking of Church property only, because it applies to both—that the hand of time had passed over them, and that the reversal of an injustice, if it was an injustice, might become in the minds of all reasonable men an injustice the more. I will take the liberty of reading the passage to the House—

“The alien Church indeed remains, but is no longer supported by a levy from the Catholic tillers of the soil; it has become a charge on the rent paid by them mostly to Protestant landlords. The confiscations have not been reversed, but the hand of time has passed over them; they have reached the stage at which, in the opinion of reasonable men, the reversal of an injustice is an injustice the more.”

I now pass to another portion of the subject—namely, the consequences of admitting doctrines which you propose to act upon, and the application of those doctrines to the case before us. These doctrines may generally be described, as what the First Lord of the Treasury calls the doctrine of cy prés, which doctrine has been further illustrated by the President of the Board of Trade. Now, according to that doctrine, the equitable doctrine of cy prés to which the First Lord of the Treasury alluded, nothing is more sound, nothing is more true, than that when property is impressed with a charitable object, and a part of this object fails, you may treat the property with respect to which the object has so failed as still impressed with the character of the trust, and, therefore, as properly applicable to the general purposes for which it was given. But what possible bearing can that doctrine have upon a case where the purpose for which the property was originally given has not failed, and where the original purpose is totally different from that to which you now propose to apply it? The two cases have no analogy, and cannot be argued or determined upon the same ground. But then the President of the Board of Trade steps in with that beautiful peroration to his most powerful speech—powerful as much in the moral sentiment which it inculcated as it was intellectually grand in itself—and he endeavours to impose on this property a religious character, suggesting that in following the advice that he would give us we are treading in the steps of our Divine Master. He pointed out, and very truly, that there was nothing more remarkable in the Founder of that religion than the way in which He went about doing good, healing the sick, giving speech to the dumb, hearing to the deaf, and sight to the blind; and though, he said, we could not hope to imitate Him in those miraculous gifts, we could do what was in our power to do—namely, to alleviate the sufferings of humanity in all those calamities which befall us. These, no doubt, were some of the attributes and proofs of the Messiahship. But they were not the only proofs—they were not the only attributes. The right hon. Gentleman omitted that which was, perhaps, the most characteristic among His attributes—that “to the poor the Gospel was preached.” It is the glory and the triumph of Christianity that it has founded and erected hospitals and infirmaries for all those afflictions which befall man. But it is not less the glory and the triumph of Christianity that it has provided means and offices of religion for all those who would otherwise be deprived of them, and of those by whom the establishments so founded are used and valued the great mass are the poor of the land. As a comment upon the text to which I have been alluding, let me remind the House of a sterling passage in the writings of M. Chateaubriand—

“The strength of Christianity lies in the cottage of the poor; for its basis is as durable as the misery of man on which it exists; ‘to the poor the Gospel is preached.’”

What is the inference that we ought to draw? It is that the charitable object of providing for human suffering is a thing which we ought not only to encourage, but to defend and preserve; but that the other object of preserving and supporting religion for the benefit of all, and especially of the poor, is one not inferior, perhaps even superior, in importance to it. You can, therefore, in my opinion, no more take away those funds which were given for the benefit of the poor, and for the purpose of providing religious services for the poor, in order to give them to charitable institutions which, under other circumstances, might be entitled to receive them, than you would be justified in taking away from those institutions any of the funds which they possess to apply them to the preaching of the Gospel. The argument, therefore, of the President of the Board of Trade it seems to me will not support the application of the surplus which he proposes. I have said once or twice in the course of my observations that if the gifts of former times now vested in the Church have been perverted or abused—or, I will add, if you can show, as you sometimes think you can, that they are no longer useful for the purposes for which they were given—then I will admit that, under proper restrictions, you might have a claim to some of these funds for the charitable purposes to which you intend to apply them. But what is the state of things? You talk as if the Church of Ireland had entirely failed in its mission. You talk as if she were sleeping over her interests and neglecting her people; as if she had neither outward activity nor inward life. But what is the real state of things? There may undoubtedly have been abuses and anomalies in the Church, and possibly there may be some still. But during the last thirty years many of these have been removed; pluralities have been done away with; sinecures, in all cases, with the exception, I believe, of one, have been abolished; parishes have been in some cases united, in others divided, as union or division best tended to promote the interests of religion; contributions have been levied upon the richer livings to make good the smaller incomes of the clergy, and so active in all these material improvements has the Church been with its lay members, as well as its clergy, that I should just like to mention the progress which has been made within sixty-eight years of the present time, both as regards the number of clergy, the benefices, the churches, and the glebe houses. In 1800 there were 1,200 clergy, there are now 2,200; there were then, 1,120 benefices, there are now 1,510; there were then, 1,000 churches, there are now, 1,579; there were then,

Mr. Walpole

295 glebe houses, there are now, 980, which you are kind and considerate enough to tell the rectors they may have liberty to purchase at their full value. But I do not wish to refer simply to the material improvement in the condition of the Irish Church; it has also made great advances in the way of spiritual improvement. I was astonished to hear the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer say last night that the Church in Ireland was set against the whole nation. Such exaggerated language as that ought not to fall from any person in this House, and still less from a Minister of the Crown. But is it true? I will not appeal for evidence on the point to the testimony of friends of the Irish Church, or to members of the Irish Church. I will not appeal, although I might fairly do so, to the striking testimony which was borne three years ago to the courage, zeal, and purity of the members of the Church in Ireland by the right hon. Gentleman at the Head of the Government; but I hope the House will allow me to appeal to the testimony of two witnesses, neither of whom could be suspected of partiality or prejudice. In the first place, I will appeal to the Roman Catholic Church, to the evidence of a Roman Catholic Bishop; and, secondly, to an English dignitary, who has had many opportunities of collecting information upon the subject, and who is calm-judging, thoughtful, and fair-dealing. Now, what does Bishop Moriarty say? Bishop Moriarty, in his letter addressed to his clergy, in the diocese of Kerry, says—

“In every relation in life the Protestant clergy we find among us are not only blameless, but estimable and edifying; they are peaceful with all, and to their neighbours they are kind when they come into contact with them; and we know that on many occasions they would be more active and beneficent, but they do not wish to appear meddling, nor to incur the suspicion of tampering with the poor Catholics. In bearing, manners, and dress, they become their station. If not learned theologians, they are accomplished scholars and polished gentlemen. There is little intercourse between them and us, but they cannot escape our observation; and sometimes, when we notice their quiet, decorous, and modest course of life, we find ourselves giving expression to the wish—

‘Talis cum sis utinam noster esses.’”

Will the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer, after hearing that expression of opinion, say that the Irish Church has set itself up against the whole nation? With the permission of the House, I will advert to the other witness to whom I referred. What is the testimony of the Dean of Westminster upon the subject? In a book upon the Three Churches in Ireland, which he has recently published—and it must be remembered that he wrote this book before this measure was before the public—after alluding to the influence which the Established Church exercises even over Roman Catholics, he remarks—

“This position Irish established clergy owe to their connection with the English State and Church. Other changes may take place in their condition; their bishoprics may be retrenched; their parochial ministrations may be curtailed; their revenues may be diminished; but so long as their position is preserved, their peculiar usefulness remains; if this is taken away, they may still perform functions common to those of other Churches, but their peculiar vocation is gone. The Episcopal Church may become an aggressive Episcopal or Presbyterian sect; it will cease to be what, with all its faults, it has hitherto been—the one religious institution which most constantly fostered liberty of thought and action, most steadily exercised a moderating influence on the country.”

Will the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Board of Trade, after hearing that testimony, adhere to his statement that the endowments of the Church of Ireland have been so abused that they ought to be taken away—or that they are so mischievous that Parliament can divert them to other uses? I have endeavoured to express my views shortly, but I fear that I have trespassed upon the attention of the House at greater length than I intended. As I feel strongly upon the subject, however, I should wish to compress what I have said into a smaller compass, and, therefore, I trust that the House will forgive me when I put into a few short sentences my principal objections to the Bill before us. My broad objection to disestablishment is simply this—that for the first time the State is no longer to recognize their duty in securing religion and religious ordinances to the people, although they possess them now. My broad objection to disendowment is this—that you are taking away the means by which that religion and those religious ordinances can be secured to the people who belong to the Church, and are diverting it to purposes for which it was never intended. My broad objection to the Bill which proposes a combination of disestablishment and disendowment is that by it you will recognize the principle and introduce the mischief of an ecclesiastical communism; at all events, you will shake and unsettle the laws relating to ecclesiastical property, not only in Ireland, but, according to the way in which you argue the question, in England also. Possibly you will shake and unsettle the laws relating to other property; and certainly you will shake and unsettle the laws which relate to the property of corporations. Viewed in this way, I believe that this measure, instead of promoting the religious peace of Ireland, will impede religious progress; I believe it will alter the moral and religious condition of a great part of the Irish people; I believe it will create a void in the remoter districts of Ireland, and in the denser mass of the population of that country, which the utmost efforts of voluntarism will never be able to fill up. Viewing the question politically, and having regard to the obligations which the Government of a country owes to its people, I cannot but see that you are destroying grants, annulling charters, and disturbing settlements upon which rest the rights, not only of the clergy, but of the laity also, while you are overturning at once the most solemn compact ever made between two independent Legislatures, which was declared to be essential, and which was covenanted to be perpetual; and you are doing this at the fiat of the stronger party against the will of the weaker party, whom, by that very compact, you have placed in such a position that it is no longer able to resist your acts. These are the objections I entertain to the Bill. The right hon. Gentleman the President of the Board of Trade said this measure will strengthen the Union, and restore harmony. If it would have that effect, we ought to make great sacrifices to secure such a result; but my belief and conviction is, that it will have a contrary effect. I, therefore, revert to what I said at the commencement—and say deliberately—that this is a revolution—a legislative revolution, indeed—but still a revolution of the worst kind; and when I consider from what it is taking, and to what it is dragging us, I trust that Parliament will yet pause before it will allow such a measure as that to become the law of the land.

SIR HENRY LYTTON BULWER: My right hon. Friend (Mr. Walpole) seems to think that liberty and prosperity were introduced in past times into Ireland by civil war and revolution. I hope that by introducing laws favourable to tranquillity and prosperity into Ireland to prevent future civil wars and revolutions. I shall not attempt, however, to argue the question before us either as a lawyer or a theologian, neither shall I enter deeply into subjects which would take me from the main point we have to decide—which is not merely how to deal with the Irish Church, but how to govern Ireland. For centuries that country has been governed under a system of inequality and partiality, and to the support of that system has been brought the greatest perseverance, the greatest talents, and all the resources of Imperial power. And yet, little by little, the ground upon which we have stood has been crumbling from under our feet, so that we are now on the last spot on which the battle of equality or inequality, of partiality or impartiality has to be fought. Resistance at this period seems to me an anachronism. When England allowed the Roman Catholics to be electors in 1793, she made it certain that they would before long be elected. When in 1829 political supremacy was given to the Roman Catholic majority, it became certain that religious supremacy would not long remain to a Protestant minority. From the earliest period that I have thought upon this matter, I have entertained the opinions I now entertain. Many years ago, standing on the spot where I now stand, I said what I now repeat—namely, that I could conceive a Statesman following any policy except an impossible policy; and I then thought our policy impossible, for it had not adopted the justice which conciliated, and it had abandoned the authority which commanded. It is said that the measure now proposed is premature and inconsiderate in its provisions. I can bring forward an authority against this charge? In turning over the pages of the Grenville Memoirs the other day, I found a letter from Mr. Charles Wynn to the Duke of Buckingham, dated December 1st, a letter in which Mr. Wynn said that he had talked to Lord Liverpool that very day on the state of Ireland, and that Lord Liverpool avowed that he saw no way of finally settling Irish difficulties, except either giving up the Protestant Church or converting the Catholics to Protestantism. No one, I believe, now contends for the realization of the latter alternative, and we thus revert to the former one, and are only at this moment carrying out the conclusion come to more than forty years ago by one of the most moderate and practical of English Statesmen—a Statesman whose zeal for the Protestant Church was only limited by his interest in the British Empire. I do not say that the Bill by which we do so is perfect in all its parts. Various hon. Gentlemen opposite have found fault with some of its details. Its supporters do not say they shall adopt all those details when the proper time arrives for discussing them; but we are now discussing its principles, and these we do say that we adopt with all our minds and all our hearts, and will defend against our antagonists, whose accusations we repudiate as based on erroneous suppositions, and mistaken prejudices. What are these accusations? First, that we intend to violate or repeal the Act of Union. Now, we do not intend to violate or repeal this Act. We intend to alter it. Why? because Ireland has altered. When this Act was passed only Protestants had political power in Ireland. At this time Protestants and Catholics exercise political power on equal terms. The political Ireland of to-day is not the political Ireland of seventy years ago, and therefore, wishing our political union with Ireland to be a political reality and not a political fiction, we change our arrangements with Ireland to suit the change which has occurred in Irish affairs. We are next accused of the confiscation of Church property. Now the nature of Church property is a question that has been debated during the last eighty years throughout Europe, and persons may be permitted to differ upon a matter on which the wisest and ablest men have differed. Unanimity does not prevail on the opposite Benches, nor on these where I am sitting. Some contend that Church property is in the same condition as private property; some that it is more like corporate property; some, that the State may not touch it; others that the State may deal with it, but only for ecclesiastical purposes; others that it may also be used for purposes of charity and education; while many contend that being applied to national uses it is national property, and that therefore Parliament, as the representative of the nation, may dispose of it as it thinks best for national interests. I do not wish to enter into this general controversy; since it appears to me that the Irish Church and its property stand upon a peculiar basis—a basis which is sui generis, and which is therefore to be judged of by its own particular merits. What is the position of the Irish Church? It is not the Church of the Irish nation; it is exclusively the Church of the Irish State, and here it differs from the English Church, which, whether Roman Catholic or Protestant, has always been the national Church. Any one who takes the trouble to open our history will find that the wars between the Yorkists and Lancastrians were succeeded by a conflict between the Catholics and the Protestants. Elizabeth gave the ascendancy to the one, as Henry VII. had done to the other; and the Protestants gaining the ascendancy in England became the State, and sought, as the State, to establish the same ascendancy in Ireland. The Protestant Church was one of the instruments they employed to obtain this ascendancy. It was easy for philosophers and historians to say that the State might at that time have taken up an independent position between religious parties. The State itself was then a religious party; and as long as it had been itself a religious party it was quite natural, and for its interests expedient, to pay and maintain a religious party Establishment. But now that the State, amid an entire change of circumstances, has ceased to be exclusively Protestant, it can no longer exclusively pay and patronize a Protestant priesthood. The Irish Church I say is, and ever has been, the shadow and servant of the State, and must follow the policy of the State, which was formerly to favour one religion, and is now to be impartial to all religions. It is possible for us, following out this policy of impartiality, to divide the property at our disposal among any clergy, or to withdraw it from any. The first course was recommended by some, and, considering the great advantage, in a country divided by religions, of collecting the sanction of religion, in all its shades, round political authority, I understand that this course has many partizans. It would be the most statesmanlike if it were the most practicable one. But “Don Fernando can do no more than he can do.” To have accomplished the plan to which I have just alluded—a plan recommended by my hon. Friend the Member for the county of Galway (Mr. Gregory)—would have required the union of opposite political parties and the adhesion of rival sects. But we could not get this union, nor this adhesion; and, therefore, seeing that that we are unable to pay all religions, we pay none. It is said that we thus inflict a hardship on the Protestant Church by depriving it of property it has so long enjoyed; a hardship on the Protestant laity by forcing it to pay for the support of that Church which has been so long supported for it. But was it not a hardship for the Catholic Church to lose the property it had so long enjoyed? Has it not been a hardship for the Catholic laity to pay their clergy, to which the State has never made any contribution? We do not wish to be harsh, but we must be just. We only mean to be just. It is said, notwithstanding, that we shall alienate the Protestant clergy and laity, and by preventing them from looking hereafter to England, link them with the large mass of the Irish people. With all respect for so valuable a class of the Queen’s subjects, I desire that this prophecy or menace may be fulfilled; it will remove half our Irish difficulties, for it will not, I believe, be difficult for us to satisfy one Irish people. Our difficulty arises from having to satisfy two people in Ireland, the one being in constant hostility to the other. But I will pass by questions of worldly policy and come to a religious question which agitates many conscientious men in this Protestant country. Are we doing aught that can injure the Protestant religion in Ireland or that will arrest its progress? I do not think, and many Gentlemen opposite do not think, that it is wise or politic to maintain a religious Establishment for the sake of converting one Christian sect to the doctrines of another. Still, there are many who think we should not destroy a religious Establishment that is existing, if it is spreading the Protestant religion, and acting as a powerful auxiliary to the Protestant faith. I will ask them, has the Protestant Church

Establishment in Ireland spread the Protestant religion in Ireland, or is it likely to do so in its present condition? Look at the Irish annals. We shall read there of famine, emigration, incendi- arism, midnight and midday outrage, insurrection, rebellion, civil war, but we shall find little on the subject of Protestant conversion. The reason is simple. From the spire of every church of our Protestant Establishment the Irishman sees flying the flag of the conqueror. We have invoked patriotism against Protestantism. We have blended the religious feelings which the boy derives from his mother and his priest in the nursery and the schoolroom with the political feelings which he imbibes from his father when he steps on to the platform of public life. We have made Irishism, Catholicism — Protestantism, the symbol of foreign domination. It is only when we can blend Catholics and Protestants, English and Irish, into one common body of British subjects; it is only when Ireland, as a whole, is tranquil and satisfied with our rule that we can hope to get it to lend an attentive ear to our religion. But if we are forced, for the interests I have named, to disestablish and disendow the Protestant Church in Ireland, are we thereby affecting — what we do not mean or wish to affect—the Established Church in England? I will not attempt to read the Sybil's book or predicate the future destiny of that beloved and respected institution. Safe from external enemies, it may fall a victim to internal dissensions. But this I will undertake to say, judging from all human experience, that it will not become weaker from the loss of an ally which always requires its aid and can never give it assistance. If there were any similarity in the position of the two Churches, I could understand how the fall of one would be menacing to the other. But is it so? In England we have a Church as yet, at all events, dear to the feelings of the large majority of the English people; in Ireland we have a Church opposed to the feelings of the great majority of the Irish people. In England we have a Church which it would require an army to put down; in Ireland we have a Church which it requires an army to keep up. Can any analogy be established between these two Churches, so different in their position? Do we menace the Church of England when we pull down the Church of Ireland, because it wants the especial quality which the English Church possesses? The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Buckinghamshire wasted his eloquence when he insisted upon the advantages arising from the possession of a national Church. I agree with the right hon. Gentleman that a national Church is an advantage; but we cannot have a national Church based on a national antipathy. A national Church must be the Church of the nation, and not the Church of a small section of a nation. I do not, therefore, think that this measure is attended with any of the injustice or any of the danger that has been imputed to it. But let us consider what would have been the danger and what the injustice if this measure had not been proposed, and what the danger and injustice if it were not now carried. We should have left, and we shall leave, the pressure of a heavy grievance on the mind and imagination of a large, powerful, and high-spirited population which we have undertaken to govern—a grievance the more galling because it is exceptional. We do not take our State religion to the great Presbyterian kingdom of Scotland; we do not take it to the small Catholic island of Malta; we do not carry it with us to our immense Brahmin and Mahomedan Empire in India; we have not planted it as exclusive in Australia or maintained it in Canada. Ireland is almost the only part of our immense possessions in which we expect the devotion and ignore the religion of the inhabitants. Is this no danger? Is this no injustice? I lament that Ireland is discontented; but I lament far more that she is discontented with reason, for a reasonable discontent is an unlimited peril. I have said that we are not merely dealing with the Church of Ireland, but with the whole government of Ireland. I will now say that we are not only dealing with the whole government of Ireland, but with the strength or weakness of the whole British Empire, an Empire which has millions and millions of men under its sway in every quarter of the globe. Nor are we to measure the importance of this Empire by its mere territorial magnitude. On its power and prosperity—a power and prosperity that must always be in incer-

titude as long as Ireland is dissatisfied—depend the colonization of desert lands, the civilization of semi-barbarous peoples, the extinction of slavery, the diffusion of commerce, the rising fortunes of a large portion of the New World, and the moral resurrection of those ancient races amidst which knowledge first dawned on the Old World. These immense interests are confided to the charge of 650 Gentlemen, who hold council within these walls. Let them, animated by patriotism, so elevate themselves as to be equal to their task! Let them look at the nations of Europe now aspiring to increase their power! There is Russia following her untiring eagles into the mountain fastnesses of Affghanistan. There is Prussia with her soldier and her scholar consolidating and extending her dominion over Southern Germany. There is Italy encircling Venice with one arm and pointing with the other to Imperial Rome. There is France with a Sovereign and a people desirous of peace, and an army which is said to be eager for war, keeping us in constant anxiety as to whether the wisdom of the one or the chivalry of the other will ultimately prevail. Has England no hopes to realize, no conquests to anticipate or achieve? Has she not before her the noblest conquest ambition can aspire to—the conquest of the hearts of a generous and unfortunate people? Shall we achieve this conquest with this measure alone? Certainly not; but we can not achieve it without this measure. We are not now expecting to satisfy, but to show that we are resolved to do all that impartial justice can demand to give ultimate satisfaction. I remember reading in distant lands a speech delivered in this House on the 17th of February, 1866, which made on me a profound impression. It called for statesmanship in the affairs of Ireland. It said what I have myself observed in various countries—that the Irish were happy and prosperous everywhere except in their native land. It adjured our rulers to inquire into and apply a remedy to the causes of this calamitous peculiarity. It prayed Heaven for a man of genius to direct our counsels. The man of genius is there (pointing to Mr. Gladstone), and the right hon. Gentleman who made the speech I have been alluding to (Mr. Bright), is sitting beside him. May we not hope that, by the union of these two eminent men, and by the co-operation of the great Liberal party behind them—at last to see commenced and carried out a compensating policy for that hitherto ill-fated land—from which patriotism should banish party—but which has been for years the battle-field of our party dissensions;—a policy which accomplishing that evening a large redress, may, by uniting boldness with wisdom, equity with energy, strengthen the weakness, heal the sores, develop the resources, and consolidate the elements of British greatness?

MR. MOWBRAY said, the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Tamworth (Sir Henry Lytton Bulwer) had characterized the policy advocated by the right hon. Member for the University of Cambridge (Mr. Walpole) as an anachronism; but the speech of the right hon. Gentleman was a still more remarkable anachronism. He commenced by taking them back to the times of Mr. Wynn, Lord Liverpool, and Lord Grenville, and reminded them that Ireland was not what she was fifty years ago, and then he carried them back to the wars of York and Lancaster. That might be an historical digression. But then he proceeded to propound a policy which was an anachronism in itself. The right hon. Gentleman said there were two ecclesiastical policies which might be pursued with respect to Ireland—that they might pay all the religious bodies in the country, or they might pay none. The former was the policy of Mr. Pitt, which in the plenitude of his power he did not venture to carry out; it was proposed forty-five years ago by Lord Francis Egerton; it was a policy which could not be carried out by Sir Robert Peel; it found its foremost and only prominent defender in the present day in that juvenile Statesman, Earl Russell. If this was the policy of the right hon. Gentleman, it was one which he was not likely to see carried out by any union of parties. The right hon. Gentleman said it was not proposed in this Bill to violate, but to alter the Act of Union; but he afterwards used language more in accordance with a different view—namely, that a fundamental change of the Act of Union was contemplated, for he spoke of our uniting ourselves afresh with a living body, which implied that there was to be a dissolution of the existing legislative union and a re-enactment of another. To return to the question raised by the present Bill, he agreed with the right hon. Gentleman that they must meet it as Statesmen of the 19th century, dealing with all the complications of the present moment; but they must not forget the history and traditions of the past, and the state of things which had arisen out of that history and those traditions. Looking at the question as a Member of the Imperial Legislature, he could not fail to see that at no period had there not been a national recognition of religion by the Government of England. They proposed to do away with the connection which had subsisted between the Church and the State in Ireland for 700 years, and in other parts of the kingdom for a much longer period. It was quite unnecessary for him to say a word in favour of Establishments. That principle had been put before them most forcibly by his right hon. Friend the Member for Cambridge University. If it were proposed to do away with this Establishment of religion, the advantages of which had been proved, what was it proposed to set up in its place? Why, the voluntary principle; but what did we know of it? We were to subvert a state of things which we were thoroughly acquainted with, and which had lasted for centuries, and we were to set up a paper thing which in itself was a mere expression. ["No, no!"] He was aware hon. Members could point, as the Solicitor-General did last night, to the success of the voluntary principle in America, in Scotland, and in many of the British colonies. American institutions differed so widely from ours, that no conclusion could be drawn from them to guide the House. The experiment of our colonial Church government also had been too brief to be taken as a sure guide. Besides this, such was the diversity of the ecclesiastical arrangements existing in our colonies, that no principle either for or against Establishment could be traced in their constitution. In India Bishops were appointed under an Act of Parliament, and paid for out of the revenue of India. In our West Indian colonies again Parliament had sanctioned the erection of bishoprics, and charged the expenses of the Establishment on the Consolidated Fund. For the instances of the voluntary principle we had to go to Australia, Tasmania, New Zealand, and some other places which had been mentioned. But in all these places these Churches had been but recently founded by the Crown; their Bishops had been nominated by the Crown after conference with the prelates of the English Church; they formed the very flower of the clergy, and the real test of the efficiency of the constitution of these Churches would come when the present generation of Bishops had died out, and new Bishops to fill their places had to be chosen on the spot. Great stress had been laid on the efficiency of the Canadian Church, and in answer to the argument based upon it the right hon. and learned Member for the Dublin University (Dr. Ball) had brought forward an article in Macmillan, testifying to the present condition of that Church. The account Macmillan gave of the Canadian Church was certainly not re-assuring, but later and more unanswerable testimony was forthcoming. The Prime Minister had paid a high tribute to the late Bishop of Montreal, whose death had fallen as a great blow on the Canadian Church; but his death was not only a loss in itself, it had resulted in what was at present a breakdown of the colonial system; the Canadian Church had actually come to a dead-lock because the Synod had been unable to agree on the election of a successor. The Bishop died in the course of the summer: the Synod was held in November last, and was unable to come to an agreement; it had been adjourned until May next, and at present the Primacy of the Canadian Church was void. The Church presented the spectacle of a province without a Metropolitan, and a see without its Bishop. Was this what the Prime Minister promised us for Ireland? Last night they were referred to the voluntary system as it was in Scotland; but, in a letter published by the hon. Member for Rochdale (Mr. T. B. Potter), sufficient reason appeared to show that the state of the voluntary Church in Scotland was one which could not be quoted in support of the present Bill. They had been told that the voluntary system was no novelty, and that it was at work in Ireland. But they could not call the Church of Rome a purely voluntary system. As Lord Macaulay had said, it combined all the pomp of a dominant hierarchy above with all the energy of the voluntary system below. It had some of the characteristics of a voluntary system—an ill-paid and uneducated priesthood and humble chapels, or, as some had described them, shabby hovels. That formed one side of the Romish Church; the other was made up of a Prelate, a Cardinal, and a Prince of the Church, encompassed with all the pomp of a dominant hierarchy which organized its operations under the direction of the Pope himself, a temporal Sovereign, and, therefore, falling back upon a State as well as on a Church. Now, any change of the present system of governing the English Church in Ireland would be followed by results all its well-wishers would deplore. It would no longer be a national Church, but a congregational Church, the evils of which had been well described by the hon. and learned Member for the Dublin University. Then as to the second part of the measure—disendowment. Both this and the proposal to disestablish were quite unprecedented, because the two precedents which had been set forth were inadequate. The case of Jamaica did not apply; the payment made to that Church was out of the National Exchequer, and was never designed to extend beyond a few years. The precedent of Canada, which had been dwelt on at considerable length by the hon. and learned Member for Richmond (Sir Roundell Palmer), was also inapplicable; the case of Canada was that of a partial disendowment, done by the Colonial, not by the Imperial Legislature. And the Act of the Colonial Parliament related to the clergy reserves lands of comparatively small value, in outlying districts, and yielding but little immediate income to their owners. Besides, the amount dealt with was smaller. The House was asked to take £16,000,000 from the Irish Church; but £275,000 was an outside estimate of the Canada Reserve Fund. The Canadian Church had not enjoyed its property for more than sixty years, and had been informed as far back as 1828 that it must not reckon for its reserves being permanently secured to it. Again, the right hon. Gentleman proposed to deal suddenly with the property of the Irish Church. He proposed to commence in January, 1871; but in Canada many years elapsed after the passing of the Act before the new arrangement came into force, and in the interval the Church was able to reorganize itself and become a corporate body. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Tamworth (Sir Henry Lytton Bulwer) had said that he did not come there to discuss the details of the Bill, and he added frankly that he did not adopt all of them. Well, it was quite possible that there might be some of the details to which the House would not be disposed to agree. He would say a word, however, as to one or two of those details, which illustrated very clearly the spirit in which the Bill was drawn up, and the different manner with which the Government proposed to deal with the Established Church of Ireland as compared with other denominations. Now, with regard to Maynooth. This College owed a debt of £20,000 for its buildings, and that debt was wholly remitted. The glebe houses of the clergy, on the other hand, had a debt of £232,000 on them, every shilling of which was to be paid back. Disendowment might commence to-morrow; be believed, indeed, it had already commenced, because, from a question that had been asked the other day, it appeared that the moment a Bishop, dean, or parochial incumbent in the Church of Ireland died, his place was not to be filled up, except in a temporary way, until the 1st of January, 1871. No new vested interests, therefore, could be acquired. The right hon. Gentleman at the head of the Government said that Maynooth in getting fourteen years' compensation, would have somewhat about an average amount between the various compensations awarded to the Church; but he (Mr. Mowbray) contended that Maynooth got sixteen years' compensation, for the payment would date from the 1st of January, 1871, before the arrival of which period, therefore, nearly two years would elapse. During those two years Maynooth would receive £26,000 a year, and, therefore, £52,000 should be added to the amount of her compensation. But there was a still stronger point. Why had the right hon. Gentleman fixed on fourteen years' purchase as the proper amount of compensation to Maynooth? The endowment of Maynooth was divided into two portions—one a sum of £6,000 for the salaries of president, vice-president, and professors; the other a sum of £20,360 for the students. Now, the course of a student in Maynooth was eight years, and assuming that an equal proportion of students left every year, the sum to be paid would be gradually reduced until the last year it would be only £2,545, instead of £20,360. The total, therefore, for students at the end of the eight years' course would be £91,620, and if that were added to fourteen years' compensation for the professors, the entire sum to be given to the College would be £175,000, instead of £441,000, as proposed by the right hon. Gentleman. He would not trouble the House much about the application of the surplus. They had had a little discussion as to whom the origin of the Bill was due, and his noble Friend (Lord Claud Hamilton) last night said that the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Board of Trade (Mr. Bright) was the author. But he thought they might go back much further, and refer the origin of the Bill to Mr. O'Connell. As far back as 1834 Mr. O'Connell proposed that tithes should be abolished, and that the fund should be applied "in various counties of Ireland to relieve the occupiers of land from grand jury cess."

"My plan," said Mr. O'Connell, "is to defray all the expenses of dispensaries, infirmaries, hospitals, and asylums, and to multiply the number of these institutions until they become quite sufficient for the wants of the sick."

Well, then, he would say, honour to him to whom honour was due, and that was in this case, not the right hon. Gentleman the Prime Minister, but Daniel O'Connell, the great Liberator of Ireland. But the right hon. Gentleman had plagiarized from another source also. They had heard from the hon. Member for South-west Lancashire (Mr. Cross) quotations from the speeches of the right hon. Gentleman, and it appears that he said that it was his special vocation to hew down the deadly tree of noxious growth; but in those words he seemed to follow out the idea of the Chancellor of the Exchequer, who, speaking of the Irish Church last year, said—"Cut it down; why cumbereth it the ground?" But he found the right hon. Gentleman's metaphor was borrowed from a prelate of the Roman Catholic Church, Dr. M'Hale, who, in 1833, had said—

"It is a consolation to reflect that the legislative axe is laid at last at the root of the Establishment. The ten overshadowing plants which spread their narcotic and poisonous influence all round them have been laid low."

The right hon. Gentleman then appeared to have been indebted for his policy to

Mr. Mowbray

Mr. O'Connell and for his rhetoric to Dr. M'Hale. The Solicitor General had said last night that this Establishment in Ireland was such that if it did not exist no Statesman would be prepared to set it up. But that was not the question. The question was—were we prepared to do away with the Church in the mode proposed in this Bill? He was sorry that the First Lord of the Treasury should have quitted the House, because he wished to call his attention to a passage from an eminent Statesman, a great authority in the Whig party—Lord Macaulay—who was known to have held strong opinions about the Irish Church. Lord Macaulay said—

"A statesman, judging on our principles, would pronounce without hesitation that such a Church never ought to have been set up. Further than this we will not venture to speak for him. He would doubtless remember that the world is full of institutions which, though they never ought to have been set up, yet having been set up ought not to be rudely pulled down, and that it is often wise in practice to be content with the mitigation of an abuse, which, looking at it in the abstract, we might feel impatient to destroy."

They might infer from that that had Lord Macaulay been now alive he would not be prepared to deal with the Irish Church in the way of total disestablishment and disendowment, as proposed in the Bill now before the House. He did not wish to trouble the House at any further length. He found in Ireland a Church which for 700 years had been connected with the State. It might be said that a change had occurred at the time of the Reformation; but he contended that the Irish Church was entitled to be viewed as the representative of the ancient Irish Church that was there before the time of Henry II. They would find an alliance between the Church and State in Ireland which, he believed, had been beneficial to the State, and not detrimental to the Church. They would find that for 300 years this Protestant Church had been connected with the Protestant institutions of the country. A national recognition of religion had been part and parcel of the Constitution of this country all the time the English monarchy had existed. Parliament met to consult on weighty affairs concerning the Church and the nation. The Sovereign, by the Act of Settlement, was obliged to profess the Protestant religion, and by the Coronation Oath was bound to profess a particular form of it. The national Establishments in the three countries, though there might be a difference in England, Ireland, and Scotland, were all equally Protestant; and speaking then as a Member of the British Legislature, viewing this as an Imperial question, and looking back to our past history and past traditions, he thought that they ought not to depart from principles under which this Empire had hitherto flourished, and under which he ventured to hope it would continue to flourish.

MR. AGAR-ELLIS said, that, as an Irishman and a Churchman, he had long thought that the person most aggrieved by the Church of Ireland as it now existed was an Irish Churchman. As was confessed on all sides, the Establishment was a scandal, and on whom did the scandal recoil if not on the Churchman himself? Suppose a man had inherited what in times past might or might not have been a proper compensation for services rendered, and those services could be rendered no longer, what would be the course which any high-minded man would take? Would it not be to give up the sinecure? Well, that he thought was an apt illustration of the position which the Irish Church occupied. One thing which struck him most painfully in this debate was that the most stalwart defender of the Irish Church—he who had made the most magnificent oration in its behalf, the right hon. Gentleman the Member for the University of Dublin (Dr. Ball)—and the hon. and learned Member for Richmond (Sir Roundell Palmer) had both made an ad misericordiam appeal, on the ground that the Irish Church could not exist unless it was supported by the State. His view of Protestantism in Ireland was that it could safely walk alone if left to itself, and he had no doubt that when the connection with the State was dissolved, it would walk alone, and with a surer footing than it had heretofore. This measure being virtually as good as passed, he was anxious that English Members should not expect too much from it. The immediate good accruing from it might indeed be said to have been already discounted, for it had already produced a good effect in Ireland. ["Oh!"] He believed he represented one of the most Roman Catholic constituencies in the United Kingdom (Kilkenny), and that he spoke with some knowledge of the facts when he asserted that this measure had already produced much good in Ireland. But he warned them that they must not look for further immediate good. That great advantages would eventually follow the passing of the measure he had not the smallest doubt; but they must not be disheartened if they did not see everything looking quite as rosy as they would wish. The first good he anticipated from the Bill was the stoppage of the trade of the political agitator. Discontent and disaffection could not go side by side with even-handed justice. Ireland would be convinced that England was no longer deaf to her entreaties when she had really a tangible cause of complaint. The hands of the Executive would be so strengthened by the enactment of this measure, that that horrible system of government which had for centuries existed, the system of party or class government, would be extinguished for ever, and the Executive whilst being just, would be also perfectly equitable. With reference to the provisions of the Bill, he confessed under other circumstances he should be glad to see the amount of the composition proposed for the Regium Donum and the Maynooth Grant doubled. At the same time, after having been distinctly told by the leading Members of the Government that none of the money taken from the Established Church in Ireland should be applied to any other Church, he had a strong objection to the proposed arrangement. They had been further told that any surplus remaining would be devoted to Irish purposes exclusively. But according to the proposed scheme, the Consolidated Fund would be relieved of a considerable charge, an arrangement which would confer the greatest benefit upon the people of England and Scotland. He was prepared to vote for anything in reason in order to secure the passing of this Bill; but this part of the measure was a blot upon it, which in his opinion greatly weakened its value. The object being to remove every cause of vexation and discontent, it would surely be better to get rid of the tithe rent-charge at once, for how many of the present generation would be living forty-five years hence? It was true there was power of redemption at twenty-two-and-a-half years' purchase, but this was not quite 4½ per cent, and very few persons would be able to find the money all at once. It should be made possible for a landowner, and even for the holder of a life interest, to borrow the required sum on the security of his estate. On the whole he viewed the measure as one that would confer lasting benefits on both countries; that would fill the minds of the people of Ireland with hope and loyalty; that would remove what had hitherto been a source of danger and of weakness to this country, and establish in its stead an element of Imperial power and strength by the cordial union of the people of Great Britain and Ireland.

MR. CHARLES DALRYMPLE remarked that no Scotch Member had yet taken part in the debate, though, so far from Scotland taking no interest in the question, it had been said, with truth, that the elections turned upon it, so much so, indeed, that one would have thought that the elections had been occasioned by the Irish Church question, and not as was really the case, by the late Reform Bill. If the representatives of Scotland, seven-eighths of whom sat on the Ministerial side, should consider it their duty to continue silent, it would be an interesting study for them during the holidays to determine how far they should feel themselves justified in giving their consent to the details of a Bill, the main principle of which they had shown themselves so eager to support. Their demeanour during the present debate, at all events, appeared to be inconsistent with the declarations which they had constantly made previous to the General Election. The affirmation of the principle of disestablishment—a stage which the friends and the enemies of the Irish Church must alike have anticipated — was nearly reached, and he had never doubted that hon. Members opposite would be united on this matter, most of them having been returned for the express purpose, and having, as it were, given a blank acceptance, which the Prime Minister could fill up for any amount he thought fit. The Members on his (Mr. Dalrymple's) side of the House had not been backward in declaring their fundamental objections to the principle of the measure under consideration and, however the subject might be overlaid by idle discussions connected with Established Churches generally, they must remember it was the existence of the Protestant Church in Ireland that was the immediate question before them, and nothing else.

Mr. Agar-Ellis

The disestablishment of the Irish Church he took to be as certain as anything that could be reasonably predicted. He rejoiced at the opportunity given them of recording their votes against the principle; but before doing so he claimed the right of making a few observations upon some of the features of the Bill. The proposed arrangement respecting the establishment of a Church Body was some evidence of that feeling of tenderness with which they were told they would be treated. He only wished that this body had more property than it was likely to have to dispose of. It appeared to him to be doubtful whether it would have any property to hold. He should have also desired to see a much larger sum paid to the Church itself. A great deal had been said about the proposition to preserve the life interests of incumbents. That was no more than a simple act of justice, for which he did not think any thanks were due to the Government. It appeared that Bishops, incumbents, and others connected with the Church were to be continued in the enjoyment of their life interests, or a sum equal in amount to the value of their livings was to be paid to the Church Body, from which they would receive their incomes, and even this small advantage ceased with the lives of the present incumbents. Now, he regretted that a larger jointure was not to be paid to the widowed Church, such as would have given it an element of certainty and permanence. A letter appeared in The Times of September 10, 1868, which he thought was full of wisdom. It bore the signature of "Rusticus." The writer said—

"If individual incumbents, curates, &c., are simply continued for their lives in the possession of existing emoluments, it is obvious that out of two or three contiguous parishes there may be one in which the Protestant Episcopalian worship will have ceased for thirty or fifty years before its discontinuance in another, and consequently there will be no one moment at which the strength of the whole communion is put forth in the work of sustentation or of re-endowment, but a ragged edge—so to say—will be left for half-a-century, while the old is passing out and the new coming in. In this respect the Irish Church will stand at an incalculable disadvantage in comparison with the Free Church, for example, or even the Episcopalian Church in Scotland. This paying off—in this form—of existing interests will be the severest blow of all to the expiring Establishment. Something seems to be due to a prescription of three centuries; something even to the communion of which we are acquiescing in the disestablishment. . . . But at last, after all such preliminaries are adjusted, let the Imperial Exchequer pay over to the Church corporation of Ireland the capital sum, the £4,000,000, or £5,000,000, or £6,000,000 agreed upon; let the Church, not the State, pay out of the annual proceeds the incomes—with such deductions as self-denial and public spirit may suggest—of surviving holders; and, as lives drop, provide for the continuance of Church pastors—in such number and on such terms as may be needful—in cures vacated; while the State re-pays itself for its outlay by receiving in perpetuity the various items of the present ecclesiastical revenue, in the nature of interest upon the capital sum by which it has purchased a final immunity from the burden of an Establishment which has failed, through fault or misfortune, to become, in deed as in name, the Church of the Irish people.”

He greatly desiderated some such plan as that, and it seemed to him that something was due not only to the interests of incumbents and to the fag ends of a lifetime, but to the interests arising out of the communion of the Church itself during a tenure of 300 years. The President of the Board of Trade, in his eloquent speech on Friday, gave the weight of his authority to a comparison for which there was no foundation. There was no analogy whatever between the case of the Disestablished Church of Ireland as it was to be and the Free Church of Scotland. Surely, in proof of that it was enough to say that in the one case they had a free agent and in the other they had not? And, more than that, what were the facts with respect to the Free Church of Scotland? It was true the ministers and people of that Church left the Establishment for the sake of principle, leaving behind churches, glebes and manses, but much of the wealth of the country went forth with the members of the Free Church; and they did not go forth in the presence of a great hostile Church, but they settled down side by side with the Established Church. Moreover, the Established Church always remained, so that if the Free Church had failed—which it had not—there was still a guarantee left for the maintenance of the services of the Church for the people. The nation, in fact divided itself into two Churches, and the satisfaction which the late Lord Aberdeen was said to have felt at that spectacle after a time was, he believed, owing to the fact that every instrumentality for good in Scotland had been been doubled. More than that, the movement of the Free Church had all the impetus given to it which sacrifice imparted to any such movement—an impetus which was something very different from the mere instinct of self-preservation or the courage and resolution of individuals. What was the case, on the other hand, of the Irish Church? Was she going forth to vindicate any principle and with no diminished wealth? Was she not to be confronted by a hostile communion, ready to seize every advantage while she was struggling to recover her equilibrium after the heavy blow dealt against her? Was there any impetus from sacrifice? Why the Irish Church herself was the sacrifice in that case, and the right hon. Gentleman at the head of the Government was the officiating priest at that sacrifice. For himself, he looked upon the arrangements of the measure in regard to the Church as very inadequate, and he asked whether justice was being meted out to all alike? The fourteen years' purchase of income to be given in the case of Maynooth, as compared with the inadequate provision to be made for the Church—which, it must be remembered, they were casting down from its position as an Establishment—did not appear to him to be a very equal and even-handed arrangement. However, he might have been content that Maynooth should go forth free from State control and with her capitalized income; but he could not help noticing the extraordinary difference between the proposed arrangement in regard to Maynooth and the view put forward in Scotland last autumn by the exponents of the Liberal policy. Maynooth had been a sore subject in Scotland; seats in that House had been lost there on account of it; and the crucial test of Scotch Members had long been whether or not they had gone into the same Division Lobby with the late Mr. Spooner upon it. Last autumn the exponents of Liberalism in Scotland came forward, not only as the friends of oppressed Ireland, but they declared that they were going to withdraw the Maynooth Grant; and in one case, when the question was asked how, if they were such great Protestants as they professed to be, they were about to deal such a severe blow to Protestantism in Ireland? the reply given was that “Providence had so ordered that, through the disestablishment of the Irish Church, the grant to Maynooth might be abolished.” The result of the elections in Scotland was due, he believed to that delusion more than to anything else. He had not made these remarks out of any feeling of jealousy towards the Roman Catholics of Ireland, but only when he remembered the political capital that was made in Scotland last year out of this fancied withdrawal of the Maynooth Grant, he wanted to know the meaning of the Maynooth surplus. With respect to the proposed application of the surplus revenues of the Church to the relief of suffering, that was essentially a question for Committee. It had been said lately, with truth, that the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Board of Trade could "delineate a picture of suffering and sorrow with marvellous vividness and truth," and any one who heard his speech of Friday last would confirm the statement. If they were dealing with abstract matters no one would differ from the right hon. Gentleman; but this was a practical matter, and he would then only say that, looking at the vast amount of that surplus, looking at the object on which they were to bestow it—an object already provided for, although inadequately, by law—and looking also at the inadequacy of their arrangements for the benefit of the Church, he did not believe the House of Commons would consent to such a fantastic application of so enormous a sum. In his Chapter of Autobiography the Prime Minister, speaking of the Irish Church, said—

"Such an Establishment will do well, for its own sake and for the sake of its creed, to divest itself as soon as may be of gauds and trappings, and to commence a new career in which, renouncing at once the credit and the discredit of the civil sanction, it shall seek its strength from within, and put a fearless trust in the message which it bears."

Some of those of his own generation who had been brought up as willing learners in the right hon. Gentleman's earlier school on Church and State would naturally require some time before they could see how the connection between the Church and State could be compared to "gauds and trappings," or how the Church could receive any "discredit" from the "civil sanction." The language addressed by the right hon. Gentleman to the Church reminded him of the words of the American poet—

"Console, if you will,—I can bear it;
'Tis a well meant alms of breath;
But not all the preaching since Adam
Has made death other than death."

Mr. Charles Dalrymple

He felt firmly convinced that the Church would "seek its strength within;" and he did not doubt in the least the power of "the message which she bears;" but if the Church survived the sorry plight in which the right hon. Gentleman proposed to place it, it would not have to thank the right hon. Gentleman for that fact. It would owe it to what a distinguished writer—the Dean of Westminster—had pointed to recently, when he spoke of that which—

"In spite of all her shortcomings, taking her at her best and not at her worst, was the free, magnanimous, and Imperial spirit of what had been for 700 years, the United Church of England and Ireland."

MR. MILLER said, he fully agreed with the hon. Member for Bute (Mr. C. Dalrymple) that, at the last elections in Scotland, the great question of the day was the Irish Church; but the hon. Gentleman should bear in mind that the result of the agitation was that, out of the sixty Members returned for Scotland, no fewer than fifty-three had been sent to the House of Commons to support the Bill now under consideration. They did this simply as an act of justice to the sister country. In giving his support to the measure he was influenced by no desire either to exalt the Roman Catholic Church, or to depress the Protestant Episcopalian Church in Ireland. He wished to see both of them placed in the proper position to carry on the work which they had to do. As much had been said of the Church to which he had the privilege of belonging—the Free Church of Scotland—he wished to bring the state of that Church under the notice of the House, with the view of calming the alarm felt by hon. Members opposite as to what would occur in the event of the Irish Church being disestablished. The hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid-Surrey (Mr. Brodrick), asked the other night how the poor Irish along the coasts of the Atlantic were to be instructed if the Irish Church were disestablished and disendowed. Now, he (Mr. Miller) would point to the case of the Free Church of Scotland as affording an answer to that question, although he might content himself with saying that it would be taken care of if the Protestants of Ireland had faith in their religion. Was it not the case that the wealth of Ireland was to a large extent in the hands of the members of the Irish

Church? It was true that they had not been much educated in habits of giving, but he had no doubt they would very soon learn that part of their duty. The hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for Richmond (Sir Roundell Palmer) stated that the members of the Free Church went forth voluntarily, and that in that respect there was a difference between the cases of the two countries. The secession from the Established Church was not a voluntary act, except that sort of voluntarism which would induce a man to jump overboard to prevent himself being shot; the secession involved a principle dearer than life. Those who went forth could only have remained on condition of submitting to an interference in the discipline of the Church to which they could not give their assent, and they were therefore compelled to secede. What was the case in Scotland twenty-six years ago? At that time a body of clergymen walked out of the Established Church, to the number of about half the parishes of that country—namely, from 460 to 470—that body formed the Free Church, and it now numbered something like 930 churches, some of which were situate in the remotest parts of Scotland, where the poorest people were amply supplied with religious teaching, and also with secular education. They were supported by the middle and lower classes, for they had not with them the landowners—they belonged chiefly to the Established or the Episcopalian Church. The strength of the Free Church lay lower down. The whole country now, from one end of it to the other, was occupied by the Free Church. Before a church was planted in a district, the question was not whether the people there would be able to pay enough to support it, but whether there was a population in need of instruction. He wished to draw the attention of hon. Gentlemen, members of the Irish Church, that in Scotland they had formed, in connection with the Free Church, a Sustentation Fund, from which every minister connected with it in every part of the country was paid a minimum sum of £150, exclusive of his manse and garden. Some ministers received as much as £600 or £700, but the lowest stipend was £150. The average sum paid last year, and derived from voluntary contributions, was £225, and he hoped it would be considerably increased this year. There had, of course, twenty-six years ago, been prophets of evil in Scotland, as there are prophets in England and Ireland now; but their prophecies had entirely failed. The people had not only supported the Free Church from the starting point, but the number of churches and the amounts of stipends had gone on increasing, and it was found that as the one increased the other increased also. It would not, he believed, be very long until the Established Church would lose itself in the number of churches which were springing up around it, belonging to the Free Church and to the United Presbyterians. These two great bodies occupied churches to the number of about 1,500, while the parishes of the Established Church were but 920 to 930. The Free Church did not confine its work to Scotland—missionary work is by it carried on successfully in India and in other parts of the world. Besides all this they had about 600 schools maintained in the same way, supplying education in the Highlands and elsewhere, to the people who had no other means of obtaining it. He would suggest to hon. Gentlemen from Ireland that, instead of making a great deal to do about the disestablishment and disendowment of the Irish Church, they should have faith in their religion, and in the strength of Protestantism, and accept the position. If in a true spirit they buckled on their armour and fought against everything which was opposed to Christianity, he had no doubt they would do a great work well and successfully. They had the upper classes with them, unlike the Free Church of Scotland, and surely they would be able to furnish all that is necessary for supporting their Church. The Scottish people looked upon the proposal of the Government as a matter of justice to the people of Ireland, and not as a matter which would injure a Protestant Church. They could not forget the struggle which Scotland had to engage in to throw off an alien religion attempted to be thrown upon them, but which they did throw off—not, however, by peaceful means, such as that in which we are now engaged—it was a struggle of war to the knife, and under cruelties of an extraordinary kind. Looking back upon that, the Scotch people have a desire to see the Irish people in the same position as they are themselves—free to carry on their religious work in the way that shall best benefit those who are engaged in it.

MR. W. VERNER said, he rose, on the part of the Protestants of Ireland, and of Ulster in particular, to enter his protest against this Bill for two reasons: first, because it aimed a blow against religion; and, second, because it was absolutely and unqualifiedly founded on wrong and robbery. He did not mean to say that this Bill would legalize infidelity: but he believed it did offer an indirect sanction to it, for, as he believed it had been said in that House, the Devil was supported by voluntary contributions; and, by a large class of Her Majesty's subjects, the administrators of the law and the landlords of Ireland were supposed to be under his especial keeping. He might illustrate this by the instance of a farmer in his (Mr. Verner's) county, who had been prosecuted by his landlord, and who informed the sub-sheriff, in strict confidence, that he believed if the Devil did not take his landlord there was no use in having a Devil at all. As one who had lived in Ireland for the greater part of his life, who had mixed freely with its inhabitants, who had superintended the management of property that was leased to tenants of all denominations, he was perhaps entitled to think that he knew something of the peculiarities of Ireland and its people; but to his surprise he found that he knew nothing of the matter, and that his education must commence afresh under the teaching of the Prime Minister and his Colleagues, assisted by the perusal of a work written by a foreign Roman Catholic. He had listened to various lectures—first, on nicety of speech and Conservative presumption in quoting the somewhat unsavoury epithets applied to his Church; second, on the charge of obstinacy and hardness of heart and head applied to them by a Gentleman who ought to be a good judge, for he was an Irishman himself; and third, on the bigotry and perversity of his Protestant ancestors, upon whose shoulders—so the House had been told—rested all the cruelties and injustices ever perpetrated in Ireland. He had entered the House prepared to listen with great attention to the arguments urged by the old and practised debaters there, and though nothing would induce him to betray the trust which his constituents had reposed in him, still if he were convinced that opinions he formerly held were wrong, he would have resigned his seat rather than record a vote which his conscience did not ratify. He had heard it stated by the President of the Board of Trade that all the talents, the eloquence, and the research of our greatest orators here were simply declamatory, and that party alone must govern the votes of Members of this House. He could well understand why he saw such satisfied smiles exchanged among the occupants of the Treasury Bench. The hon. Member for Kilkenny (Mr. Agar-Ellis) had just told them that Ireland had become more prosperous, more contented, and more happy since this Bill was introduced than she ever was before. Good gracious! Did the hon. Gentleman read the newspapers? Had he taken account of the Fenian meetings which had been held since the prisoners had been let loose? Had he seen the treasonable speeches these men had made, and the firm determination they expressed to go on troubling the peace of the country as long as they lived? The right hon. Gentleman the President of the Board of Trade had been to Ireland, and though his reception there was not very cordial, or such as induced him to prolong his stay, yet he came back more convinced than ever that all the evils of Ireland were to be attributed to the Protestant Church and the Protestant proprietors, and that both ought to be destroyed. But if the right hon. Gentleman had studied the Census of 1861 with respect to Ireland, he would hardly have advocated the voluntary system in that House so warmly as he had done. In 1861 the population of Ireland was 5,798,000, of whom the members of the Church of England were 693,000, the Roman Catholics 4,505,000, the Presbyterians 523,000, the Methodists 45,000, the Independents 4,500, the Baptists 4,300, the Quakers 3,600, and there were 15,600 belonging to 112 other sects. The two bodies, the Independents and the Baptists, were those usually known in England as Dissenters, and they had had everywhere agencies in Ireland for the last twenty years; but the result of the voluntary system in their case was, when counted, the great sum of 8,800. Among the members of the Church of England he found there was 16 per cent who could neither read nor write, while among the Roman Catholics 45 per cent could neither read nor write; and of those who could, he would like to know how many owed their education to the kindness of the Protestant landlords living in the country, and who, without interfering with their religious creed, gave them the best education in their power. He had heard much said of the change of opinion in the rival Leaders, and the inconsistency of statements made by them at different times; but there was this difference between them. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Buckinghamshire, in calm and temperate language, stated his convictions as the result of careful study and deliberation. The Prime Minister, on the other hand, had no words strong enough to revile and vilify the Church of which, to his (Mr. Verner's) surprise, he still professed himself an attached member. When that right hon. Gentleman urged his followers to

“The lawless siege, whose best success was sacrilege,”

by comparing the Church to a upas tree of noxious growth, which spread blight and desolation around—when he spoke of her as a monster of iniquity which must be levelled with the ground, he felt inclined to say to the right hon. Gentleman, in the language of the immortal bard quoted on the first reading of this Bill—

“Fie, fie, unreverend tongue! to call her bad,
Whose sovereignty so oft thou hast preferred
With twenty thousand soul-confirming oaths.”

and he would ask whether an Assembly of Gentlemen, distinguished for their intelligence and independence, could be expected to follow the right hon. Gentleman in every change of principle as well as policy? No doubt there were earnest Protestants among those who walked in the Prime Minister's apparently triumphal procession; but he could only compare the car in which the right hon. Gentleman rode to the car of Juggernaut, which served to immolate the victims of their own credulity, and left nothing but ruin and devastation in its wake. He had heard a great deal said about the ill-will with which the Protestant Church and the Protestant clergy were regarded in Ireland. But it always struck him as extraordinary if the Church were regarded with so much dislike that they found the Protestant ministers living in remote and isolated parts of the country surrounded by Roman Catholics, and yet, as far as he knew, there was not a single case in which one of them had been made the subject of agrarian outrage. Adventurers whose trade of throat-cutting was terminated by the cessation of the American War, and who were too much accustomed to live by violence and rapine to settle down to any steady and useful pursuit, came over to Ireland and instituted a raid in that country, with nothing to lose and everything to gain. These were the authors of the Fenian movement, which was coquetted with by the Roman Catholic priesthood to further their own ends, until they found that it was getting too strong for them, and was assuming a character of independence from priestly control. But even when the priests did repudiate the movement, they did so in cautious terms. The Pope, it was true, also denounced it, as he had done Freemasonry and Ribbonism, but it was merely as secret societies. But how often had they found the execution of a sanguinary decree following on altar denunciation? He positively denied on the part of the Protestants that they hated the Roman Catholics. They detested Fenians and priestly agitators, to whom the term upas tree might be more fitly applied than to the gentle curates of his own creed, who openly practiced those doctrines of forbearance and charity which they preached in the pulpit. He did not deny that there were bigots in every creed, just as there were dishonourable people on railway Boards; but it would be as unjust to condemn the many for the faults of the few as it would be to condemn all railway Boards because a few directors had broken the eleventh commandment. Seriously speaking, he believed that Irishmen would live together as amicably as it was possible for Irishmen to do if they were only left alone by those interested demagogues who lived by exciting the cupidity of the people and ministering to their worst passions. A great deal had been said about Irish pugnacity, but Englishmen were not aware of the extent to which it was carried. Anyone who had witnessed the faction fights in the West of Ireland must be aware all were of the same way of thinking, and nothing was said about them, because it was impossible to dignify them with the name of Orange riots. No funeral could take place without a certain amount of broken heads, and even the cats devoured each other in a peculiar manner. A gentleman who had lately written a work on Ireland detailed a conversation which had taken place between two farmers, one of whom said to the other—"When all the Protestants and landlords are driven out of the country, how we shall fight among each other?" The object of his observations was to show that although the Government might play the Ultramontane part of disestablishing the Church of Ireland, they would not succeed thereby in inspiring the Irish peasantry with any feeling of order, loyalty, and respect for the laws. They were only swayed by their own passions and interests. The difference between the native Irishman and the Saxon was this—that Irishmen always allowed their interests to be injured by giving way to their passions, whilst the others always made their passions subordinate to their interests. If this proposition was allowed, it would be at once seen why all attempts to establish law and order in Ireland had failed. The fact was that the issue of this struggle was between Protestants, and Popery in Ireland. It must be so, because the Roman Catholic religion was essentially an aggressive one, and could not bear the existence of a rival Church. Archbishop Manning and the Roman Catholic Prelates told them so, and more—that if they had the power they would not tolerate the principles of civil and religious liberty for which they were now clamouring. The Penal Laws had been alluded to, but he believed they were only referred to for the sake of political capital, as they had long since been repealed, and were repudiated by both sides of the House. Those laws, however, were enacted, not so much against Roman Catholics as against traitors, and no laws of the kind were passed in consequence of that most atrocious conspiracy the Gunpowder Plot. No hon. Gentleman on that side of the House approved more of the Penal Laws than Roman Catholic Members on the other side would justify the infamous act of the infamous Pope who blessed the infamous massacre of St. Bartholomew, and had a medal struck to commemorate the event. He did not blame Roman Catholics for wishing to see what they considered truth exalted in the place of error; but he did blame Protestants—he did not wish to say anything disrespectful—who were fools enough to assist them in passing a measure for their own destruction. If justice demanded the repeal of all the Acts against the Roman Catholics, how were they to deal with the Act of Settlement? Could they suppose that the time would come when a Minister of the Crown would propose to substitute the authority of the Pope for the gracious title by which the Queen now ruled the country, and that was by the grace of God. He regarded the Constitution as the natural safeguard both for the Crown and the people. If one part was destroyed, what was to prevent the whole edifice from tumbling about their ears. They were the guardians of the Constitution, and all parties in the House would agree with him in saying that rash experiments ought not to be attempted, because those experiments were irrevocable, and if they did not turn out as they were expected to do their steps could not be retraced. There was an experiment that would find favour on both sides of the House, and test the loyalty of Ireland to the core. Let them abolish the senseless pageant of the Lord Lieutenantcy, and send over a Royal Prince to maintain royally his Royal mother's state. The aristocracy of the land would rally round him, the country would flock to do him honour, the fire would burn again on many a deserted hearth, the sun would shine again through windows which had long been barred, and the sound of mirth and hospitality would rise from halls long deserted; the money taken out of the country would be returned to it, some of the wrinkles would disappear from the brow of Ireland, and the smile of prosperity, with its natural concomitant, contentment, would illumine once more the national face. Then they might safely try the experiment of a general amnesty, in the hope and belief that the good sense of the nation would back the law in proclaiming as traitors to the commonwealth all those who should attempt to disturb its peace.

THE O'DONOGHUE said, the right hon. Gentleman the Member for the University of Cambridge (Mr. Walpole) who opened that debate, seemed to him to argue in favour of the necessity of an Established Church in a country where there was unity of religious faith, and, so far as his observations had no reference to the subject now before the House, he (The O'Donoghue) could have no part in dealing with a great deal of what the right hon. Gentleman said. The right hon. Gentleman appeared to him to forget that what he had to defend was the existence of an Established Church in a country where the majority of the people were all of one religion and the Established Church professed another. But what took him by surprise in the speech of the right hon. Gentleman was his quoting Mr. J. Stuart Mill as an advocate for the maintenance of the Established Church; and as Mr. Mill's name had been mentioned, he would take the opportunity of saying how greatly he deplored his absence from that House, and when the news that he had lost the Westminster election reached the part of the country where he resided he felt as if a national calamity had fallen upon the land. The right hon. Gentleman had given the House an erroneous view of the views of Mr. Mill. He quoted from Mr. Mill's pamphlet—

“An alien Church indeed remains, but is no longer supported by a levy from the Catholic tillers of the soil, but has become a charge upon the land, and is paid mostly by the Protestant landlords”—

And here he (The O'Donoghue) would venture to remark that that seemed to him to be very much the same thing—

“The confiscations had not been reversed, but owing to the time that had passed over them they have reached a stage in which in the minds of reasonable men the removal of injustice would be itself an injustice.”

What he (The O'Donoghue) understood by that was that it would be an injustice to give back the revenues of the Church to the Roman Catholics. Mr. Mill considered the land question to be the chief of Irish questions, and at the conclusion of his pamphlet, talking of the land question, he said—

“Let no one suppose that while this question remained as it was the sum of all other things that could be done for Ireland would at all alleviate her condition, although an abundance of other things require to be done. Not only are religious endowments to be resumed, but their proceeds to be applied in the most effectual way possible to Irish improvements.”

Nothing could be more unreasonable than that the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Buckinghamshire should complain of the policy of Her Majesty's Government. The right hon. Gentleman and his Friends became instrumental in carrying a measure of Reform which had considerably increased the Parliamentary constituencies of this kingdom, for the right hon. Gentleman and his Friends avowed their readiness to appeal to, and their readiness to abide by, the verdict of the enlarged constituencies, and now that the verdict had been so emphatically pronounced, and so faithfully represented by the measure before them, he asked the Constitutional party how they could say that opposition to Her Majesty's Government did not mean opposition to the nation? The Commons were never so fairly represented as in the present Parliament, which would obviate that delay in legislation which had become an intolerable characteristic of the Parliament elected by a more contracted body. The right hon. Gentleman and his Friends had described the measure as confiscation, robbery, spoliation, sacrilege, as tending to substitute the supremacy of the Pope instead of that of the Queen, and as leading to the disruption of the Empire. He was not surprised that the hon. Member for Bandon (Mr. Shaw) should object to that high style of oratory, which consisted in the reckless use of words of great length and awful import. No one could see why they should charge, not them, but their countrymen generally, with those high crimes and misdemeanours. What had happened was simply this—the vast majority of the electors of the kingdom had declared it to be inexpedient and unjust that a small minority of the Irish people should monopolize the whole of the ecclesiastical revenues of Ireland, and they were now endeavouring to give practical effect to that declaration of the national opinion. As a Member of the House of Commons he was proud of the talents and solicitous for the fame of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Buckinghamshire, and he was always sorry when the right hon. Gentleman took the philosophical line, because he then invariably laid down propositions quite untenable. His theorizing the other evening on the union of Church and State, and the necessity of having an Established Church, appeared to him the merest special pleading. Now he (The O'Donoghue) thought the Government could be carried on quite as well without an Established Church as

with one. He was far from saying that there were not conditions in which great advantages might arise from having an Established Church, but only when there was unity of faith or something approaching to it. It was impossible to show the utility of an Established Church, or to defend its maintenance, when those who rejected its doctrines constituted the vast majority of the country. The aim of this Bill was to establish religious equality in Ireland, and to establish it on the principle of disestablishment and disendowment, instead of establishment and endowment. He had always felt that in a country where there was such a diversity of religious belief and so many different sects, religious equality could not be brought about in any other way. What was called the "levelling up" system was only proposed to encourage squabbling, and thereby prolong the existing state of things. The Irish Church had many defenders, but it was impossible to reconcile her position with the principles of equality. If her defenders were asked whether they were for or against religious equality, they never gave a plain categorical answer. They did not wish to face the odium of declaring themselves the friends of religious inequality, and so set themselves to invent reasons why religious equality could not exist in Ireland. He would give one or two more specimens of what he called this harmless style of reasoning—"As a small minority of the Irish people had appropriated the ecclesiastical revenues of Ireland for the last 300 years, a small minority has a right to appropriate them for the next 300 years;" "As far the greater number of the Irish landlords are Protestants, the tithes must, as a matter of course, be devoted to support the form of worship which they profess;" "That it is immaterial to reflect that the tithes of a portion, or the value of all the land of Ireland, have from time immemorial been set aside for ecclesiastical purposes;" "That the Catholic occupiers who pay nearly all the rents, which include the tithes of Ireland, do not contribute directly or indirectly one farthing to the support of the Established Church;" "That in Ireland, Church property and private property are identical, and that you cannot interfere with one without endangering the title of the other;" "It is true that Church property has been interfered with in Italy, in Spain, in Portugal, and that private property has not sustained any injury in those countries, but this would not be the case in Ireland." The latest and newest of all these specimens came from the right hon. and learned Member for the University of Dublin (Dr. Ball), who said that the Irish Protestants were so particular about the breeding of their parsons that they must be provided with ample means to induce fine gentlemen to enter their pulpits. This was what he called the harmless style of reasoning, because it could convince nobody, and only helped to illustrate the weakness of the cause it was intended to advocate. But there was another method which, although it did not convince the understanding, roused the passions of men on both sides of the question. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for the University of Oxford (Mr. Gathorne Hardy)—who might be taken as a full-blown sample of the English "No Surrender" politician—had argued that the Irish Catholics must be tolerated, but that they could not have equality; that the Irish Protestants were to be maintained in possession of the ecclesiastical revenues, because they were of the same race as the majority of that House; or, in other words, because he regards them as Englishmen and not as Irishmen—and because their ancestors had been the faithful allies of the political ancestors of hon. Gentlemen opposite in the misgovernment of Ireland. He also said that the revenues of the Protestant Church in Ireland were to be maintained for the purpose of "feeding the lamp of the Reformation"—or, in other words, to force the doctrines of the Protestant Church down the throats of people who for more than 300 years had continuously rejected them, and who, no matter what might be thought of their faith by others, must be admitted by all to have adhered to it with an enduring fervour. Happily those who adopted the style of reasoning to which he had referred were in a considerable minority in that House and out of it. If it were otherwise no Irishman would be warranted in telling his countrymen that they had anything to expect from the justice of England, or from the efficacy of constitutional action. Ireland would in that case still be governed by faction and held by force with a strain on the connection which rendered it liable to be snapped at any moment, very possibly to be re-united, but with blood-stained ligaments. So far as he was concerned he accepted this Bill as a most satisfactory settlement of the Irish Church question, and he should suspect any Liberal who opposed it of being actuated by the spirit of intolerance. He should be sorry to see it altered in any substantial particular—indeed, in any particular at all. The smallest concession to bigotry—either on the side of Protestants or Catholics—would defeat the object of this Bill. He did not disguise from himself that if the clergy and laity of the Protestant Church combined, and if they were animated by the zeal for which he gave them credit, the Bill afforded them opportunities for laying up rich treasures for their Church. He did not complain of this. All he asked for his Catholic fellow-countrymen was equality, and the Catholic who would be satisfied with anything less than equality and the Catholic who at this moment revived old pretensions were as much enemies to the peace and prosperity of Ireland as the most rampant advocate of Protestant ascendancy. He expected great things from this Bill, although he did not expect instantaneous results, more especially when hon. Gentlemen opposite were endeavouring to create the impression that this Bill would never pass, or that it would only pass in a mutilated and useless form. It was only too true that there was much distrust of that House in Ireland, and it had yet to make its reputation in a favourable sense with the mass of the people of that country. There had been an infinity of bad legislation for Ireland, much abortive legislation, and a persistent disregard to the earnest appeals of Irishmen for justice. He was not the only person there who had staked his political career on the assertion that all this was about to be changed. He had made this venture because of the confidence he felt in Her Majesty's Government, and in that great Liberal majority, which he believed represented their countrymen in nothing so fully as in the kindness of their sentiments towards Ireland. It still remained for the great Liberal party to give the Irish people confidence in that House, and they could not make a better beginning than by an Act which would be not merely an act of justice, but to which, for the sake of the union of Ireland, they would have sacrificed some cherished English prejudices.

LORD GEORGE HAMILTON said, he was very unwilling to obtrude himself on the notice of the House; but as the great constituency which he represented (Middlesex) had, in a manner as unmistakable as it was remarkable, expressed their entire disapprobation of the first principles of that Bill, he hoped the House would feel that he had sufficient excuse for addressing them upon that occasion. In the course of that discussion he had been much struck by the malignant pleasure with which hon. Gentlemen opposite who professed the Protestant faith but represented Roman Catholic constituencies seemed to take in abusing their own religion. They had a remarkable instance of that in the amusing declamation of the hon. and learned Member for Londonderry (Mr. Serjeant Dowse). That hon. and learned Gentleman had informed them that he was a Protestant Episcopalian, but no one could have suspected the fact from the general tenor of his address. He gave as a reason—"it was the cheapest and most respectable religion." If, however, this Bill passed, and the property of the Church were taken away, it would be no longer the cheapest religion, and, consequently, he supposed it would cease in the hon. and learned Member's opinion to be the most respectable. The constitutional part of the question had been so ably examined that he would say nothing upon that subject; but no sophistry, however ingenious—no eloquence, however sonorous—could disguise the fact that this Bill directly violated the Prerogatives of the Crown, infringed the fundamental principles of the Constitution, and deliberately ignored every compact entered into between the House and Ireland. It also violated the Union between England and Scotland, as would be seen by reference to the 11th clause of the 3rd Article. They had been told by the President of the Board of Trade that he did not care for parchment. The information was unnecessary, for that side of the House had learnt it by experience. It mattered not whether it was a postal contract or the guaranteed existence of a small State, if exigency required it the compact was disregarded. The right hon. Gentleman the First

Lord of the Treasury, in his celebrated Letter which he wrote in 1865, when a candidate for the representation of the University of Oxford, said that he took the Act of Union as a landmark which must have important consequences, especially as regards the position of the hierarchy. The landmark, he (Lord George Hamilton) greatly feared, had now vanished. But perhaps that might be looked upon as what was called "a declaration of intention" — a thing which whatever might be its advantages had not the benefit of being binding. Hon. Gentlemen opposite had referred to past history, and expatiated on the enormity of the penal code. He did not wish for a moment to defend that code, but it ought to be remembered that this same penal code which had been so much denounced was forced upon the Protestant Church of Ireland by the policy adopted by the Roman Catholic Church. These hon. Gentlemen forgot that in those days men were rougher and ruder than they were now, and the sole means of defence which were suggested were retaliatory, and if the former erred in doing this she merely erred in adopting the policy of her ancient rival the Roman Catholic Church. Hon. Gentlemen, again, in referring to history did not paint both sides fairly. Much had been said about the massacres of Cromwell and William III., but they seemed to forget that these were the natural consequences of the massacre of 1641, when upwards of 80,000 Protestants were butchered in cold blood, and that under religious auspices. In referring to these things he had no wish to increase political rancour. He was not in favour of making political capital in that House or out of it by raking out of the graveyards of past times the records of crimes and atrocities committed hundreds of years ago. He called attention to the facts merely for the purpose of showing that if history were referred to it would not be so completely in favour of hon. Gentlemen opposite as they were willing to suppose. The argument had been adduced against the Church of Ireland that some hundreds of years ago it was most venal and corrupt; that its ministers did not faithfully fulfil their obligations; and that, in short, it was full of evil and all that was of bad report. Now he contended that the more venality, the more vice, the more corruption, and the more evil that existed formerly in the Church was only a stronger argument for maintaining it, because hon. Gentlemen on both sides of the House admitted that there nowhere existed a better body of men than the Protestant clergymen of Ireland, or a body of men who fulfilled their duties more zealously and uprightly, and with the anxious desire to do all which they undertook. Therefore, he repeated, that the more corruption and crime and vice were proved to have existed hundreds of years ago in the Church of Ireland only showed the great improvement which had taken place in that Church, and the desirability of keeping up such an institution. What reason or justification, then, existed for bringing in a Bill to sweep it off the face of the earth, to prevent it—in the words of one of its most eminent opponents from "cumbering the earth?" Into the question of disendowment he would not enter. That had been already done by the hon. and learned Member for Richmond (Sir Roundell Palmer) in an argument which not only was unanswerable, but which nobody down to that moment had attempted to answer. He confessed that he did not know how weak the case of the Government really was till last night, when a right hon. Gentleman of the eminent ability of the Chancellor of the Exchequer could only make so lame and stilted a reply. However, the speech threw this new light upon the question; the right hon. Gentleman said that everybody ought to "walk into his own creed," but he did not explain how this extraordinary performance was to be accomplished. Into the details of the plan of disendowment nobody yet seemed to have entered; but he ventured to say that a more extraordinary plan had never yet been proposed to Parliament. He did not count much upon his own experience; but he candidly asked hon. Gentlemen on either side if they ever remembered a Bill of such importance the Preamble of which was directly at variance with the clauses? The Bill contained a wholesale system of bribery. Everybody was to be bribed excepting those for whom the endowments were made—namely, the laity of the Church of Ireland. But if one thing had struck him as being more curious than another in the course of this discussion it was those professions of political morality with which hon. Gentlemen opposite always thought it necessary to preface their observations in support of the Bill. When he listened to these protestations he was reminded of the story of the sanctimonious pirate who kept the Ten Commandments hung up in his cabin, with the exception of the eighth, which was carefully erased. With regard to the surplus to be derived from disendowment he confessed that at first sight it appeared fair to give it for the purposes contemplated; for if it was thought necessary to apply money originally devoted to religious purposes to secular purposes, it certainly seemed that it could not be applied to better ends than the relief of suffering. But the more he looked into the plans for the distribution of the surplus the more he thought it no exaggeration to say that out of the proceeds of the disendowment of the Church a new endowment and a new Establishment were to be formed, an endowment, in short, of a gigantic monastic and conventual system, to be supported out of the spoils of the plundered Church of the Reformation. The surplus was to be devoted to five purposes. First of all, it was to be given to the support of hospitals and infirmaries for lunatics, and the county cess was to be relieved. Now, anybody who knew Ireland knew perfectly well that there were lunatic asylums in that country which were not supported by the county cess. He need only mention three—the Mater Misericordia Asylum, the hospital of St. Vincent, and the hospital in Jarvis Street. All these were attached either to monasteries or to nunneries. He wanted, therefore, to know if the surplus was to be applied for the benefit of lunatics how they were to prevent a portion of the money going to the support of the three asylums he had mentioned, and thus finally to the support of monasteries? The application of the money, of course, was intended to be secular; but perhaps this was a mere declaration of intention. The second purpose to which the surplus was to be devoted was to the maintenance of industrial and reformatory schools. Now, almost all these institutions had been established for Roman Catholics in connection with monasteries and nunneries, especially those at Monaghan, Cork, and other places. He asked, again, then, how they were to prevent the Church's funds going to the support of monasteries and nunneries if money were given to these schools? A third object to which the money was to be applied was to schools for trained or skilled nurses for the poor. Now, who were the skilled nurses for the poor in Ireland? Why, the nuns. He did not wish to say one syllable against those ladies; one could not but admire the consistency with which they performed the duties which they undertook. But the opinion of the English people was that the advantages of the system were more than counterbalanced by its disadvantages, and that opinion had been strengthened by a recent trial not very far from the walls of that House. It did seem to him incredible that a Government could come down seriously to the House and propose a scheme, one of the features of which was the endowment on a large scale of nunneries, when one of the ablest and best of that Government had been so lately employing his energy and ability in exposing the drawbacks and cruelties of that system, and whose appeal to the jury had been applauded to the echo by the thousands who filled the Court and its approaches. As regarded the care of the deaf and dumb and blind, this hitherto had been achieved by voluntary effort, and the proposals of the Government in that respect could only have the effect of stopping private contributions and freezing up the sources of charity. Of the operation of the Bill upon the curates, he would only say that it did seem a miserable thing to enact that no matter what energy or ability a clergyman might display in his office, he never was to receive one sixpence more than the miserable pittance which was at present paid to him. By the very nature of his employment a clergyman could not better himself elsewhere as a layman might do, and the terms of the Bill actually made his pittance conditional upon his remaining in the place where he might be at the passing of the Bill. He had not been in the House when the hon. Member for Kilkenny (Sir John Gray) made some remarks affecting a near relative of his, the Duke of Abercorn, stating that by the Commissioners' Report the Duke appeared to be in possession of 5,736 acres of Church land in the bishopric of Derry at 2s. 7d. an acre, and was not satisfied that it would be impossible to pass this Bill without all the jobbery and waste involved in some of its details. He presumed that the Bill required to be greased and manipulated to make it pass through the narrow passage lately opened in the wall of Scotch prejudice, and that it must be further lubricated and salivated in order that it might be swallowed by the boa constrictor of Irish landed proprietorship. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Buckinghamshire and the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for the University of Dublin (Dr. Ball) were of opinion that funds of the Established Church should be devoted to their original use. It was his own opinion, too, that they ought to be devoted to the religious uses of the whole of the Irish people, not in a spirit of narrow and sectarian prejudice, but in a spirit of mutual charity and justice. It had been said that the Irish Catholic Bishops had distinctly objected to any portion of those funds being allocated to Catholic purposes. They had done nothing of the kind. If such an allocation were made in a manner otherwise unobjectionable the Irish Catholic Bishops would have no power to reject it. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Buckinghamshire said that the Government would require the co-operation of the ministers of the Established Church in Ireland to enable them to carry out this Bill. It appeared to him that the only co-operation required of these rev. gentlemen was the acceptance by them of the money which it was proposed to give them. He had no doubt that this co-operation would be given; nor did he doubt that from the Catholic Bishops the Government would receive the same considerate assistance. An old proverb said—"There is nothing new under the sun," and from some of the speeches he had heard in this debate, he thought that nothing under the sun could be considered obsolete. One hon. Gentleman, whom he had neither the pleasure of knowing nor the pain of hearing, was reported not only to have revived the old notion about the Coronation Oath, but to have warned his Sovereign against adopting the opinions of the most eminent jurists in preference to his own. Another hon. Gentleman, whom he might designate as the Scipio Africanus of South-west Lancashire, had ventured to inform the House that the one religious institution which had fostered liberty of thought and action, and had most steadily exercised a moderate and civilizing influence over the whole of the country, was the Irish Church. But the fact was that the Penal Laws of which so much had been said were passed at the suggestion and desire of the Irish Church and Irish Parliament, and were frequently met by remonstrance on the part of the English Legislature. The intent and object of those laws was not only to inflict upon the Irish people every possible evil, but absolutely to stimulate them to the commission of the worst crimes of which human nature was capable. ["Divide!"] He was not going to hold Irish gentlemen of the present day responsible for the sins of their fathers; but it should be remembered that the most iniquitous of the penal enactments were passed in spite of remonstrances from this country, and that each generation of the defenders of the Irish Church opposed and resisted each new and progressive step in religion and legislation. He might venture to say that the wrong with which they were now dealing had received the most indignant condemnation from the greatest men who had lived during the last half century. It had been condemned by English Lord Chancellors, Chief Justices, Prime Ministers, and Leaders of the Opposition; by the constituencies of England at the last election; by the majority of the House consequent upon that opinion of the constituencies; and by the opinion of the two most eminent men in the ranks of the Opposition. The verdict against that Church had also been expressed in terse and unequivocal language by a great political philosopher—Lord Macaulay—who said—

"When a Legislature is called upon to decide whether an institution shall be retained or not, they ought first to ask whether it is a good or a bad institution. I think that the Established Church of Ireland is a very bad institution. I will go further—I am not speaking in anger, or with rhetorical exaggeration; I am calmly expressing, in the only appropriate terms, an opinion which I formed many years ago, and which all my observation and reflection have confirmed, and which I am prepared to support by reasons, when I say that of all institutions now existing in the civilized world, the Established Church of Ireland is the worst."

He did not ask hon. Members to pin their faith to Lord Macaulay; but such an expression, used by such a man, was not without weight. The right hon. Baronet (Sir Stafford Northcote) had asked the meaning of the two terms "Protestant ascendancy" and "religious equality," as these phrases were used in Ireland. Now he (Mr. Moore) would endeavour to inform him. "Protestant ascendancy" was no phrase of the Catholic party—it was a Protestant phrase, and one of great significance, long used by a body of men who knew their own meaning probably a great deal better than the right hon. Baronet knew his own. Protestant ascendancy at that time meant, as it was described by Burke to be, a division of the people of Ireland into two classes—the one to have all the rights, the property, and the education of the people exclusively to themselves, the other to be the mere hewers of wood and drawers of water. Protestant ascendancy, in a subsequent generation, meant just as much of all those advantages as the Irish Protestants could manage to retain for themselves and prevent their fellow-countrymen having. At the present day Protestant ascendancy meant the Irish Church and all those concomitant advantages which the Irish Protestants could still use to their own profit and to the injury of their neighbours. Religious equality meant the obliteration of all those differences of caste which Mr. Burke had described as being claimed and possessed by Irishmen of one religion over Irishmen of another. He understood it to mean the abolition of Protestant ascendancy, or—to use an agricultural figure—the pruning of those sectarian trees whose branches shut out the light, and whose roots impoverish the soil. The hon. Member for South-west Lancashire (Mr. Cross) said that the great question of disestablishment and disendowment was never discussed as an abstract principle last Session, and these things were never traced to their sources and examined in their consequences. At all events they had been discussed abstractly enough in the course of the present debate. The Attorney General for Ireland was wrong in stating that the right hon. and learned Member for the University of Dublin (Dr. Ball) abandoned the principle laid down by the Leader of the Opposition in opening the debate; on the contrary, his chief merit was that he interpreted clearly into the vernacular the more lofty phrases of his political Leader. The purpose of both was to prove—first, that the object was to overthrow the principle of Church Establishment in this country and to establish the voluntary principle; second, that the principle of voluntarism was a bad principle, and the principle of Church Establishment a good one; and third, that, irrespective of the merits of the two systems, it was unconstitutional and even sacrilegious to divert the funds of a Church once established to secular objects. Allowing these propositions, for the sake of argument, at all events, it must be admitted that, to justify the maintenance of any religious institution, the primary purpose of that institution must be fulfilled. The principle on which Church Establishment was founded was the right of every man, poor or rich, lord or peasant, to religious instruction in life, and religious consolation at death. It was on this principle the early Christian Church was founded and the early Reformers proceeded. The acts of the first Reformers were cruel, but their purposes were not, for their intolerance was a large and hopeful one, founded on a hope and an intense conviction that they would ultimately force all mankind into one Church. When it was said that there was not a single precedent for the confiscation of the property of a Church once endowed for secular purposes, he referred to what had occurred in Scotland, and also to the Act passed in 1690, after the Scotch abolished prelacy, declaring that all the property of all the Bishops, prelates, and other dignitaries who had ceased to exist under the Scotch law should be thereby confiscated to the uses and purposes of the King and Queen and their successors. And accordingly the whole of the property of the prelacy and episcopacy of Scotland had remained in the possession of the Crown from that time. The arguments now addressed to them in this debate would have been just as strong if they had been addressed to the Scotch Convention on the occasion to which he referred. No one could doubt that it was to disestablishment and disendowment that Scotland was indebted for the possession of religious freedom, and the like results might be expected in Ireland.

MR. GATHORNE HARDY * : The hon. Member who has just sat down has used language which we have certainly not been accustomed to hear from that side of the House. He has stated as a fact what every one of his Companions has hitherto absolutely denied, for he has told us that this great question has been brought before the House in consequence of the political exigencies of party. When such a charge as that has ever been hinted at from this side of the House, we have been hushed by a cry of shame at the mere idea of imputing such derogatory motives to those who sit on the Treasury Bench ; but now they have heard the charge from one of their own supporters, though it must be admitted he has supported them in a somewhat Irish fashion. The hon. Member says he supports the Bill which proposes, as everyone knows, entire disestablishment and disendowment, because he thinks there ought to be universal establishment and universal endowment. He has told us he objects to the application of the surplus funds in the way proposed because of the waste and jobbery which will ensue in the course of its administration ; still he says this is the measure which will pacify Ireland, and which, despite its unsatisfactory details, pacifies him. With respect to the remarks of the speaker who preceded him (The O'Donoghue), who did me the honour to comment upon some remarks of mine made last year—though I think he somewhat misinterpreted them—I have little to say. The hon. Member tells us that we who were in Office last year were bound, when we had appealed to the country, to abide by the verdict of the country, and, having been defeated by a majority on the hustings, that we have no right to come here and maintain principles which we ourselves advocated on the hustings. But the hon. Member should recollect that he himself has not always been in a majority in this House. There have been occasions in which he and others, his co-patriots, would have been ready to die upon the floor of the House in behalf of principles supported but by a very small band. He has thought right, no doubt, in deference to the principles which guided him, to maintain his opinions in the face of a majority ; and if he has had the satisfaction of converting the Treasury Bench by his eloquence and patriotism, let him exult in the possession of such allies ; but at the same time allow us, who are deputed to speak in another sense, and to represent the opinions of those who have sent us here, to speak boldly that which we believe, and to contend to the end against measures which we believe to be detrimental to the State. After the Reform Bill of 1832 the Conservatives who mustered in this House formed a much smaller band than sit upon these Benches now. In 1832, it was supposed the majority was about to sweep everything before it, and yet, in 1834, Sir Robert Peel was summoned from Rome. Already the signs of what they were attempting to do against the Church in Ireland had raised the feeling of the country against them. They went on step by step in their downward career, till at length the time came when Sir Robert Peel, in 1841, supported by the country, returned to the House with a majority of 91, and the great majority which followed the passing of the Reform Bill was thus dissipated as mist before the sun. I have faith in the principles we are professing, and when I am told by the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Board of Trade, and by others who have spoken like him, that all thoughtful men are against the Irish Church, that for fifty years every Statesman has looked forward to some such consummation. [Mr. BRIGHT: Every Liberal Statesman.] Every Liberal Statesman ! I admit the right hon. Gentleman's consistency, and I admire it ; but let him look at those by whom he is surrounded. Are they the Liberal Statesmen who have so looked forward ; I see the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Morpeth (Sir George Grey) behind him. It is but two years since he told us that such a measure would produce a revolution. I look upon my right hon. Friend the Member for Oxford (Mr. Cardwell), and the language he employed fell very little short of that. I could name others. There is my right hon. Friend, the representative for Limerick (Mr. Monsell) ; he said there was no one who wished to destroy the Irish Church, and no intention of destroying it. These things are in our recollection. They are not mere matters of history ; they have happened within the time that we have been in this House. The right hon. Gentleman opposite (Mr. Bright) may exult in his own consistency ; but when he speaks of Liberal Statesmen who have advocated this measure I must ask him

to look back and tell me who they are. Let him look back at Plunket. Was Plunket a Liberal statesman? If ever there was a Liberal statesman he was, and yet he declared that the measures which he advocated, with an eloquence never rivalled in this House, were not in any sense in hostility to the Established Church. I might name others, but I will pass onwards. I am not going now to give any extracts in proof of what I say, because I believe the House is wearied of extracts, and there are some with which I may have to trouble it later in the evening. We were asked by the right hon. Gentleman who introduced this Bill to give him credit for having carried out his promises. Sir, I give him credit for having carried out his promises, in the sense of destructiveness, to the fullest possible extent; for having done his best to destroy and sweep away all that he once held precious. But when I look for the leniency and generosity which were to be expected, when I remember the words used by the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Board of Trade last year—"Let us be generous, let us be gracious, let us be even tender in dealing with this subject," and then remember the terms in which this matter has been spoken of as "a winding-up," as the right hon. Gentleman opposite called it, and see the name of the President of the Board of Trade on the back of a Church Bill—a most unusual place for it—I think I can see what counsels have prevailed. But the right hon. Gentleman's name was put there, I suppose, to satisfy the extreme Liberationists and to show them that Her Majesty's Government were prepared to go the extreme length of destruction. We are told that this is a great question, and that practically there was no alternative. The right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary for Ireland informed us that no internal reforms in the Church would by any means meet the necessities of the case. It is therefore of no use that I should address myself in any sense to the question of these reforms. [The CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER made an observation across the table.] I hear my right hon. Friend (the Chancellor of the Exchequer) murmur something across the table. From his speech last night every one knows there is not the slightest use in addressing any arguments to my right hon. Friend. He has told us that he is determined to alter the position of the Church in Ireland, and I am sure, with that firmness which he possesses—but which some would call by a harsher name—he will persist in his determination. I may assume, then, that alterations have been made such as to fit the Irish Church for the peculiar position in which she is placed, and to make her perfectly adapted to fulfil her functions in that sphere. I have a right to assume this, because I am told that it would be no use to argue the matter. But then I am told that however improved or perfect in herself she may be, she is an "anomaly," a "monstrosity," an "injury to Protestantism," and that there is but one remedy, the "severe and sweeping" remedy of disestablishment and disendowment. When I look back within my own recollection, and remember the great changes which have occurred with respect to the Roman Catholic hierarchy, the Roman Catholic priesthood, and the Roman Catholic laity; when I see the privileges which have been conferred upon them, the equality to which they have attained in all civil matters—I will come to the question of religious equality afterwards—when I recall all the civil privileges which have been conceded, that they are placed on the same footing as their Protestant fellow-countrymen, having their chaplains in many of the institutions of the country, who are recognized as ministers in almost as great a degree as those who belong to the Established Church—when I find all these things, and find, too, that they have still something more to demand, founded on—I will not use the term sentimental grievance, which has given so much offence—but on something which rankles in the mind of Ireland, I cannot help being reminded of that which was the great cause of the envy and malice and cruelty of one who was once in a very high position—namely, that "Mordecai sits in the King's gate." All availed nothing so long as Mordecai sat in the King's gate. That is alleged to be the feeling in the breasts of the Roman Catholics of Ireland. No matter what good the Church may have done, no matter how exemplary its ministers may be, the very respect in which they are held seems to be the cause of all this

jealousy, and they must be pulled down. Now, the Dean of Westminster has said that the "demand for the destruction of a rival without advantage to ourselves may be vengeance, but it is not justice." Yes, it is vengeance; that is what is asked for in this case with respect to the Establishment. Now, I have some difficulty in dealing with this question of disestablishment, because we are not met in a bold and straightforward manner except by some hon. Member below the Gangway, such as the hon. Member for Merthyr (Mr. H. Richard) who spoke last night. When I appeal to some hon. Members, they say—"We are not against Establishments. We think them excellent things." The right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Bright), I admit, does not say they are excellent things; he says, "Put England and Scotland out of the question—we have nothing to say about them at present." Others say it is a question of time or of circumstance, and that we are not now dealing with Establishments generally, but only with the Irish Establishment. Well, I am bound to say that, in my opinion, the Irish Establishment does a good work. I look upon it, and especially since the period of the Union, as a part of the Imperial Establishment; but you are trying to separate Ireland from the Imperial Government; you are setting up a new system, totally contrary to that which used to be contended for in this House. Mr. O'Connell and others used to say—"Give us like institutions;" but now the demand is—"Give us unlike institutions; let Ireland be governed on Irish principles," and you are endeavouring to make a severance in this Imperial realm, and to put Ireland on a different footing from England. I believe that in Ireland the parochial clergy are doing an excellent work. You go through a list of parishes and say—"There are only thirty Protestants here and only forty there;" and you turn round on the Commissioners—whom it is not my business to defend—and say that they themselves admitted that you should not keep a resident minister among forty people, but should leave them to be scattered from the fold. In answer, I say, in the first place, you are misrepresenting the Commissioners and misrepresenting I think also the hon. and learned Member for Richmond (Sir Roundell Palmer) for I understood both him and them to recommend, not that spiritual sustenance should be altogether withdrawn from such people, but that parishes should be combined and the strength of the Church so distributed as to make it most efficient. When you speak of the clergyman's work in an English parish you do not speak of the number of people who have sittings in his church, or who are communicants, but you say there are so many residents in the parish, and by that you measure his work. When, however, you speak of the Irish clergyman's work you adopt a totally different principle. You say,—"We have a Census, and we find that he has only so many belonging to his Church." That, however, by no means measures his work—for though the clergy in Ireland may confine their religious ministrations to their own flock, they do not so confine those ministrations which are ministrations of charity—visits to the houses of the people, attention to their temporal wants, and the watching over their educational interests. In many such ways their attention is directed to the poorer members of their flock throughout the whole parish; and it is absurd—nay, more, it is cruel and unjust—to measure their work merely by the number of people who belong to their congregations. Again, I maintain, in spite of all the protestations from the other side of the House, that the Established Church is the nation's distinct recognition of an Almighty superintendence. It must make that recognition in some way on public occasions, in public ceremonies, in matters of State connected with the head of the Executive. In all these matters the State is put forward as religious and as Protestant, and the Sovereign at this moment is represented alike by her lay representative and by the Church in Ireland, in accordance with that religion which you have entailed upon the Crown by the Act of Settlement. She is represented in Ireland as the head of the Executive by the Church. Is the Monarch, then, to be regarded as "a badge of conquest?" Is the settlement of the Crown to be abolished in deference to the cry for religious equality, and are the 24,000,000 or 25,000,000 of Protestants in this country to give way to the 5,000,000 or 6,000,000 who may feel aggrieved in their minds, though not injured in any way otherwise, by the fact that their Sovereign is a Protestant? You are going on that account to deprive the Church in Ireland of her position, and degrade her from the position to which the State has exalted her, a position which brings with it nothing of insult or of arrogance, or injury or of oppression, to those who have not the same privileges? That position does not injure the Roman Catholic any more than it injures the Presbyterian, the Wesleyan, or the Baptist; and if you base your measure on the ground of religious equality, you cannot test that by numbers. It is a question which goes to the root of Establishments, and of endowments, also; for if there is to be absolute religious equality, you must reduce all to the same level. It does not matter, therefore, whether there are 5,000,000 or 500,000 who differ from you, for if you are to act on that principle you must put all religions on a level, not only in Ireland, but in the whole Empire. Indeed, there are plenty of people who hold that principle, and the right hon. Gentleman opposite (Mr. Bright) is one of them. He does not, it is true, press it forward at this moment; he is a great deal too prudent for that; nor do I blame him for keeping it back. He has got quite enough on his hands already, for he has a work which has been described by the right hon. Gentleman at the head of the Government as gigantic, and one such as has never been performed in any period of tranquillity. Members opposite who treat the matter so lightly should really pay some attention to their Leader, and should not take away from him the credit of a "gigantic" work by representing it as an easy one.

I am not going over the ground so ably traversed by the hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for Richmond—the question of disendowment. He asked what wrong the Irish Church had done that it should be deprived of its property, and he showed that much of the evil that had been prevalent in it was owing to the State. I fully agree with him in that question, and I also agree with him that the State crippled the Church—nay, worse than crippled it, for it filled it with its own minions, persons unfit for the duties of the clerical office, who were only sent to Ireland in order to fill their own pockets and those of their relations, while they served the supposed interests of those who appointed them. These things were bad enough; but they have passed away, and I need only address myself therefore to the present position and work of the Church? It has been said that it supported the Penal Laws. Now, I am not going to defend those laws, and they have been sufficiently condemned by every Member who has spoken; but they were passed by and have had their advocates among those who are called Liberal Statesmen. Even in recent times, indeed as recently as within the last year or two, they have been spoken of by a Liberal Statesman without that indignation which one would have expected him to exhibit. Some years ago I read something written by Lord Russell in his Essay on the Constitution—published originally, I think, in 1828. Being curious to see what he had said I referred to the book, and I find that after going through the various outrages, as he said, committed by the Roman Catholics during the reigns of Elizabeth and James I., he added in reference to the Penal Laws—

"Whether the precautions adopted by Parliament were wise I will not decide, but I am clearly of opinion they were just."

It is only just towards the noble Lord that we should look at what he says in the last edition, and in the edition published in 1865 I find the sentence a little altered. As it stands there it is this—

"That the precautions adopted were wise I will not affirm, but I cannot deny that they were the result of many injuries."

And in both editions occurs the following passage:—

"It must not to be supposed that a nation so humane as the English acted in this harsh and unusual spirit of bitterness without deep provocation."

Therefore, with respect to the Penal Laws, I say that not only were they passed by Liberal Statesmen, but they have also been upheld in these days as just by one of the Leaders of Liberal Statesmen. Now, has the Church of Ireland left something undone which she ought to have done? I quite admit—it would be folly to deny—that in the time of Queen Elizabeth it was the intention that the Irish Church should be the Church of the whole nation. It was intended—although they went in a very extraordinary way about effecting their intentions—that that Church should gradually obtain a hold over the minds of the Irish people as the Church of England had obtained a hold over the minds of the English people. But in order to effect that they sent there those who were not able to speak Irish, the tongue of the country, those who preached in Latin or English if they preached at all and said prayers in Latin if they said prayers at all; and who, in fact, did everything in their power to prevent the spread of the religion which it was their mission and professed intention to spread. And in addition to that, in Queen Elizabeth's time, Ireland was in such a state that beyond the English Pale there was really no security; that those who went there found it much safer to live within than without the Pale, and that, except within those limits, very little was done for the religious instruction of the natives. But, coming down to more recent times, the Church of Ireland has long been in much the same position as she is now in as the Church of a minority. As was stated by the right hon. Gentleman, her numbers at one period were 100,000; now they are 690,000, or, in round numbers, about 700,000; so that she has increased, at all events, numerically, and she has also increased in proportion to the other communions. Now, the right hon. Gentleman last year spoke of the emigration from Ireland as having much more materially affected the Celtic, or, as I may call them, the Roman Catholic, population than the Protestant. I have endeavoured to ascertain the facts as far as I could. I find that the Lord Lieutenant had an inquiry made into the emigration from Ireland, whether it was true that it consisted more of the Celtic part of the population than of the other races. Dr. Handcock who was appointed to examine into this matter, says—

"It is manifest that the causes which have led to such a large emigration to England and Scotland, and such a still more extensive emigration abroad, have affected the people of Ireland alike, whether descended from native Celts, or from English and Irish settlers. The causes must, therefore, be general; and it is impossible to ascribe them to any policy of the Legislature or the Government directed against a particular race or creed."

I am bound to say that the right hon. Gentleman at the head of the Government dealt fairly in one respect, for he said he did not think it would be just, at the time when the Irish Church was so ill-used as she used to be, to look to her for great results, although I myself the results were considerable, even period. But the right hon. Gen took some thirty-five years ago time at which the Church was really set free—and then he asks has she done? Well, Sir, she has much. I shall probably be contrary on that point; and I must, then, endeavour to fortify myself as I can with evidence, and with authority as I think the House will dispute. I say that the Church of Ireland has made many converts; may be, by violent controversial proceedings, but by a quiet influence which affected the minds of those who have been around her clergy, and who gradually become leavened by their sentiments. Besides that, in special instances, there have been great made for conversion, as, for example the West of Ireland; and, I may say, that I hold in my hand one from one of the Roman Catholic papers of Ireland at the time, the and quoted in a pamphlet published in Belfast, in February last, by the Rev. Seymour—

"Witnesses more trustworthy than Sir Head; Catholic Irishmen who grieved at the spread and success of the apostasy, that the West of Ireland is deserting the fold; and that a class of Protestants, more and anti-Irish, if possible, than the folk of the old Establishment, is grown up from the poorest peasantry and their children."

That showed that by inquiries on the same side as those who were benefited by the influence of Protestant teaching, the same conclusion was arrived at, and that there was a reason for these conversions. I will quote evidence from a letter of a Mr. (an Independent clergyman, who was connected with a New York regiment of artillery during the late civil war) says—I quote from a pamphlet published by the Rev. Dr. Massingham—

"In this country I have frequently heard that the Irish Church has been a failure in its mission, &c. But this only shows how well known on this side of the Atlantic of the and all-important work done in Ireland by the holy men in the Established Church. Ministers in the United States see the fruits of the labours of the Established Church. Chaplain to the sixth Regiment New York Artillery, in the late war, and I have gathered about 300 Irish emigrants, who attended my services, Bible classes, and classes, and all testified to me that they

ceived the truth as it is in Jesus, from ministers of the Established Church in Ireland."

The hon. and learned Member for Oxford (Mr. Vernon Harcourt), in a speech which he delivered at the time of the elections, referred to something which I had said about conversion. He said—"Look at the reasoning of the right hon. Member for the University of Oxford, who says that the Irish went to America and were converted there. That shows the advantage of the voluntary system." And he went on to remark—"Think of our using such an argument as that, in favour of the Irish Church." Now, no doubt, my hon. and learned Friend is fond of turning sarcastic sentences, both in speaking and writing, and I do not grudge him that turn respecting what I said. I will bear the indignity of being supposed to argue that because people were converted in America, the Irish Church was shown to be a success. I think I have shown that in America it is found that the people who go over have been affected by the teaching of the clergy in Ireland, and that whereas a certain number of millions emigrated as Roman Catholics, there is only a proportion who have there declared themselves such. On this point I might quote Archbishop Whately, who in his conversations with Mr. Senior, said—

"The emigration diminishes the apparent number of the conversions, for many emigrate because they have been converted, but do not like to encounter the persecution which almost inevitably awaits them here."—["Journals, &c., relating to Ireland," by Nassau W. Senior. London, 1862. Vol. 2, p. 130.]

I would rather take the opinion, however, of a hostile witness, of a person who was adverse to the Established Church. Dr. Andrews, Vice President of the Queen's College at Belfast, is averse from the system of proselytism in operation in the West of Ireland. The passage I am going to read shows that at all events certain consequences result, although he does not attribute them to the same cause that I do—namely, the effect of the Established Church. He condemns proselytism, but says—

"As one result of this overbearing conduct (of the Roman Catholic parish priest), I may refer to the indifference to his old religious habits usually exhibited by the Irish emigrant when he lands on the Continent of America. Among the many inducements to abandon the old country for that land of promise, the prospect of escaping from his spiritual taskmaster at home is not the least considerable."

I will not dwell further on that point. I think I have made out that the Church of Ireland has held up the light of the Reformation in that country, and that she has held it up in parishes where otherwise it would not have found its way; that she has introduced it into the minds of many who, although while they were in Ireland they appeared to be adverse to the Church, yet, when they withdrew from the influence of those who had power over them and arrived in America, acted on their own convictions. You say that the Church has not had so great an effect as she ought. But it ought to be borne in mind that there is a resistance to all religious teaching, and more especially of one religion against another. Yet I think I have shown that the Church of Ireland has increased the number of her members under circumstances of great difficulty, and in spite of the immense emigration of Protestants in the last century. She has increased her proportionate numbers in Ireland, and has besides children in America and Canada to bear witness that she has testified to the truth of the principles of the Reformation. I am surprised that the advocates of the Church of Rome should complain of her missionary work, for I never take up a Roman Catholic paper published in England without seeing advertisements of missions being established for the purpose of attracting converts. They go into places where there are no Roman Catholics, importing a few and converting some. In fact, their system is to compass sea and land to make a proselyte. They cannot, therefore, justly reproach others for doing the same thing, so long as no bribery or unfair means are used. No one would palliate or justify anything like bribery, and I, for one, should be the last to do so.

I have now shown that nothing has been done or has been left undone by the Church of Ireland which would justify us in taking away that which belongs to her. But the right hon. Gentleman opposite (Mr. Bright) remarked that my noble Friend (Lord Stanley) said at Bristol—"There is an Irish question." Now what is the Irish question? It is this, that the Imperial Government of this country does not succeed satisfactorily in the government of Ireland. We admit it. Difficulties arise with every Government. But is that the fault of the Church of Ireland or of the State of England? You say it is the fault of the Church of Ireland, and in order to prove that it is so you at once propose to make an experiment on it as in corpore vili, and think to conciliate the feelings of those who are adverse to our Government in Ireland by throwing this sop to them. But if the sacrifice is to be made it ought to be made by the State. If the Church has been in fault, the State in former days made her what she is, and is responsible for the evils within her. At all events, she is now doing her duty and using her endowments well. You may tell me, perhaps, that, however well she may use her endowments, she is such an offence in the eyes of the people of Ireland that she and they must be swept away. Now, I assert that the State did not endow the Church of Ireland. The State may be responsible for the establishment of the Church, but not for its endowments, although she is responsible for the protection of those endowments. Therefore, I think, looking back on all that has passed, that it is an unwise course which the Government have adopted, instead of adhering to that temperate line of policy which was commenced some time ago, and which, although it may not have succeeded to the extent that some people hoped for, yet has met with constantly increasing success up to the present time. If that temperate course were steadily persevered in, we should have arrived at a better state of things much sooner than we shall do by the revolution that is intended. The hon. and lively Member for Derry (Mr. Serjeant Dowse)—I mean the hon. and learned Member—in the speech which he made yesterday, said this was only the opening of the gate, and he told us something about social equality and other things which he shadowed forth that would enter through the revolutionary gate now opened by the Government. You sacrifice the Church first for the faults of the State. It is like the story told by Sidney Smith, that when a hungry mob came to the Bishops while they were at dinner and demanded that the dinners should be given to them, the right reverend Prelates threw out the dinners of the deans. So the State proposes now to throw out to the hungry mob the Church of Ireland, to be devoured, but it will whet the appetite for more, as vaguely indicated by the hon. and learned Member for Derry. But we are told by some that the endowment is corporate property, and that, because it was given to a national Church, the State has a right to do what it likes with it. I think that argument has been already sufficiently answered. It does not belong to you now, it never did, and, in fact, you admit this by bringing in a Bill to take it from those to whom it does belong. I saw it stated in one of the great organs of public opinion that nothing was so easy as to prove that the public gave these endowments. Why are you then going to throw the onus of proof on the Church? I think it rests with you. Let us be free from the difficulty which you are going to impose upon us—a difficulty which my right hon. and learned Friend (Dr. Ball) explained when he alluded to the obstacles which stood in the way of producing title-deeds with respect to these endowments. I will not go back to the time of the Reformation, or discuss with the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General for Ireland (Mr. Sullivan) the question of how many Bishops conformed. On that point I will merely observe that I think it has been abundantly proved that, instead of only one Bishop having gone over, as he stated, they conformed in large numbers, with what sincerity is not the question. Passing by, however, the pre-Reformation endowments, but by no means renouncing the right to them, I wish now to say a word on the post-Reformation endowments, which were clearly meant for the Church as it is, and I would call the attention of the House on this subject to a few words of Mr. Shirley, one of the Commissioners, who ought to be well-informed, and who says—

“In conclusion it may be said that of the original patrimony of the Church before the Anglo-Norman invasion but little remains, and that little consists solely of lands. Of the tithes and lands granted to the Church between the eras of the invasion and the Reformation probably the whole of the lands, and one moiety at least of the tithes, are in the hands of the laity, having been discovered from the Church at the fall of the monasteries in 1536. Of the remaining property of the Church,—namely, the glebe lands, no less than five-sixths were granted to the Reformed Church since the Reformation; the same may be said of the Bishops' lands in Ulster which were granted in 1609. It is evident, therefore, that the Church at the present time, is in possession of much smaller endowments than she was once entitled to, and that a large proportion of the remaining endowments have been acquired since the Reformation.”

I think my hon. and learned Friend

the Member for Richmond (Sir Roundell Palmer) has shown that you cannot make a distinction in the case of these endowments, between those given by private persons, by Kings, or by the State. They all go into the same property in the bulk, though they may be severed in this sense that there are a number of corporations, for the purpose of handing them down in the several districts to which they are appropriated. They, nevertheless, yet remain the property of the whole Church, and as such have been recognized by various Acts of Parliament. Here I am bound to say that, in my opinion, the argument of my hon. and learned Friend the Member for Richmond went a little beyond the point at which he stopped. I think that his arguments in favour of these endowments cover the Bishops' property in Ireland, and the property in those parishes which have not 200 members of the Established Church in them. All I take to be part of the property of the Church as a whole, though it may be applied to the purposes of different districts. I shall not enter at length into that point on which my hon. and learned Friend dwelt with such force—I mean the vested interest of the laity. No one who heard his argument can, it seems to me, doubt that it is mainly for them that the property of the Church exists, and that for them it ought to be preserved. I come now to that which appears to be so beloved by my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer—the voluntary system. So much does he regard that system that, even in the case of the meteorologists of Scotland, my right hon. Friend will not give a single farthing, trusting to meteorological enthusiasts by the voluntary system to afford them the necessary support. Now, I am by no means going to attack that system. It has done wonders both in England and in Ireland. I trust that it will accomplish even still more, for with all the appliances which the Established Church may possess, there are numbers whom it cannot reach, and with a greatly increasing population growing up around us, the difficulties of its position are becoming daily more and more apparent. The voluntary system has not done, nor can it do, all that is required alone. But are there no legal and moral impediments to your resorting to it in Ireland?

I am now about to touch on a point which to many persons may seem antiquated and absurd. It does not belong, perhaps, to the class of subjects which engage the attention of philosophic inquirers; yet I feel called upon to speak of it, if not as an impediment in itself, yet as calculated to operate as a moral impediment in its effect on the feelings of those with whom you are about so rudely to interfere by your legislation. You are anxious, you say, to secure the peace of Ireland, and you are dealing with 700,000 persons, besides a large number of Presbyterians and Methodists, who are deeply interested in the fortunes and prosperity of the Established Church. You are therefore dealing with a very large, influential, and thoughtful class of persons, who are sensible of their rights, and anxious to maintain them. In speaking, then, of the Act of Union, I must speak of it as they look upon it. They regard it as an Act guaranteeing to them their rights in the position in which they now stand, for at the time of the passing of the Act the Church of England was, as it is at the present day, the Church of the minority. Well, that being so, you are now about to change the Act of Union. When, last year, I said that an eminent lawyer told me that in taking this step you would be ipso facto repealing that Act, by doing away with that which was an essential part of it, and that it would be necessary to introduce a saving clause into your Bill, the statement was ridiculed by those who now sit on the opposite side of the House. But, how does the Bill under discussion actually stand? Why, have not eminent lawyers advised you to insert in the Bill a clause, stating in substance that it only affects the Act of Union so far as the two Churches are concerned, and saving it in other respects? When, therefore, the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Board of Trade says that you make no change in the Act of Union by your measure, I point to the clause introduced by yourselves to show that that statement is not exactly in accordance with the fact. Has time altered the position of things since the Union? Suppose a Bill of this nature had been brought forward within five or ten years after the passing of the Union, what would have been said? Would it not have been denounced as a gross breach of faith?

Would it not have been described as a violation of the treaty of Union? Would it not have aroused great indignation throughout Ireland? How has the state of things altered since that time? The Church has had longer possession. She has been year by year changing her condition, because Churchmen have been spending their money upon her, they have been educated for particular positions within her, they have done everything to show that they rely upon your legislation. When, therefore, you now turn round upon them with such a measure as this, I say that in their view—and I am speaking now from their view—they have a right to say that you are committing upon them an injury, and, instead of causing peace you will be arousing irritation and exasperation which will not be easily allayed.

Now, one word with respect to another subject upon which I speak with great reluctance, and, I trust, with becoming delicacy. I say that in this Bill, in order to avoid all difficulty hereafter, in order that there may be no misleading of the public mind, that the public may not think you are doing that which is contrary to what the Monarch of the country is obliged to swear, you should have taken steps to alter the Coronation Oath. I do not at all say that the nation cannot absolve the Monarch from an Oath which is taken as between the nation and the Monarch, but that Oath, as it stands, places the Monarch in a most invidious position. I ask any one to read the Coronation Service, and see what a formal and elaborate Oath is imposed by that ceremony—an Oath which, taken in its literal sense, may mean that no action should be taken by the Sovereign at all, either in her legislative or in her executive capacity, to interfere with the property or rights of the Reformed Bishops in Ireland or England. I say that that is an opinion which has laid hold of the minds of the people of Ireland, and it would have been far better both for the present and the future that some notice should have been taken of it, and that the Oath should have been abrogated by those who are desirous to act in contravention of its supposed intention, in order that no Monarch hereafter may be placed in so invidious a position. I pass from that. Much has been said with respect to a disinterestedness of the Roman Catholics in Ireland, and told that they ask for nothing is not absolutely the case, for are some who would be glad something. The hon. Member (Mr. G. H. Moore), for example, that if the money were read would be plenty found to take it have a shrewd suspicion that this case. A very excellent Roman Bishop has written a letter, full of the right hon. Gentleman's site, in which he has dropped hints which I think may be or into something like what the hon. Member for Mayo spoke of. Bishop I is evidently very much annoyed there should be any prospect of mutation of the life interests of the clergy. He said—

“What need is there of the communal interests? Is not this a wilful waste of a portion of the national property? Suppose, that you thus create a re-endowment of the property of the Irish Church. Will you hear the last and latest of the question?”

It is obvious that he desires the of the Church to remain as a re for whom? Again he adds in re to the Church Body—

“It should be noted that there is no corporation in the Irish Catholic Church, for the possession and transmission of we are obliged to have recourse to the this disparity continued, we should consider Protestant Church specially protected law.”

These opinions show that gentlemen are prepared for future use; I then to the language of another though not an Irish Bishop. Goes—Bishop of Liverpool, as I he is called—speaks much more on the subject. He said—

“That he could not for the life of him the Prime Minister could, with any abstinence, allow the Irish Church, on ceasing to be established, to take away with it what might have acquired by private benefactions the date of its establishment, and yet refuse to give back to the Roman Catholic property which came to them by private benefactions, and of which they were deeply robbed at the time of the Reformation. He said that the Catholics did not wish it, was not the question; justice was just they might rest assured that if men and influence of good feeling had for a time declined to receive it, they would eventually be forced to consider the justice of accepting it. But present Bishops, the clergy of Ireland have a life interest in the property; therefore theirs could bar a just claim which exists in part of their successors; hence—he did not as a politician, but as a simple man—he did not think it was a just measure; for if the Prime Minister respected private benefactions since the Reformation he ought also, in common justice, to respect private benefactions made prior to the Reformation.”

It appears, therefore, that some of the Bishops would be very glad to obtain this money. And now is it not a fact that establishment of religion is a thing which the Roman Catholic clergy and laity consider a duty on the part of the State, and the advantage of which is a right on their part? Has this not been expressed by the head of the Roman Catholic Church in the strongest terms, and is it not avowed in all cases in which it can be safely avowed? Therefore, though a common jealousy of the Church now unites the Roman Catholics with sectarians against us, I cannot help feeling that there must be at heart among the Roman Catholics a feeling that in assisting to destroy Establishments they are making a precedent which may one day act most injuriously against themselves. But we have been told that we have no right to think that the effects of this measure will extend beyond Ireland. Well, when we hear some of the speeches made in this House, we might well distrust such a statement. But what of speeches outside? What have we to say of Wales? An hon. Member has spoken to us of Wales, and we know how many have spoken outside this House on the same subject. I could have wearied this House with most wonderful extracts of speeches of ministers and others in Wales, who speak with all the glowing language of the Principality, and express intense hatred of the Church, desiring to throw her down as strongly as anybody in Ireland can desire it. Here I must turn aside for a moment to a personal question. The hon. Member for Merthyr (Mr. H. Richards) referred to a speech which, three or four years ago, I made upon church rates, now abolished. I can only say that in then stating that money was borrowed for the purpose of building chapels in Wales, I spoke on information received from a gentleman of high authority, and who, I have no doubt, would be ready to stand by what he said. As I only heard the hon. Member's denial of this statement last night, I have had no opportunity of looking for papers or making investigation so as to give a satisfactory answer. But if he, being thoroughly acquainted with Wales, tells me that no such thing exists, I am ready to withdraw the statement, and am sorry that I have been misinformed. You say that the Irish Church is a hindrance to the spread of Protestantism. Do you think that your Roman Catholic allies are of that opinion? Do you think that the Irish Church forms no obstacle to the spread of Roman Catholicism? Do you imagine that the language used by you and by the Dissenters represents accurately the feelings of the Roman Catholics on this subject? If the possession by the Church of the endowments constituted a real impediment to her action the Roman Catholics would be the last persons to desire to take them away. The hon. Member for Swansea (Mr. Dillwyn) argued that the Church was a mere department of the State, and that you have a right to deal with the Church as you dealt with the municipal corporations. Well, how did you deal with the corporations? You took the property from the old corporations, and gave it to the reformed corporations. You dealt with them exactly in the same way as the Church was in a former day dealt with—that is to say, the property, that is, the pre-Reformation endowments, passed from the old institution to the reformed institution. The title in each case, then, is the same. There is a point upon which my hon. and learned Friend the Member for Richmond touched which may well be urged again, for it is of great importance. I refer to the case of the Dissenting chapels, the possession of which for twenty-five years was made an indefeasible title by Act of Parliament. Although the congregations in possession had changed from Trinitarian to Unitarian, a creed different in the most essential point from that of the founders of the chapels, legislation was actually undertaken to preserve the title to these buildings only held for twenty-five years. If such was the recent action of Parliament, does it not appear the strangest and most incongruous proceeding to take away from the Church in Ireland that which she has held for centuries, and to leave her only a part of that which she has had for the shortest time—namely, the private endowments most recently acquired? You say you are going to conciliate Ireland by this measure; but if that were likely to be the result, I should have thought that the time of hope would have been the moment when people would be more disposed to look at the bright side of things than the time of fruition. Well, during this time of hope how are the Irish people employed? I will not speak of Fenian meetings held by Fenians themselves, but what strikes me as a deplorable feature is that men who have dishonoured themselves, not only by disloyalty, but by the schemes of such diabolical cruelty as showed them to be the enemies of mankind—who, though their own hands may not have been imbrued in blood, have, nevertheless, been the associates of assassins—have been, on their liberation from imprisonment, received as heroes and martyrs. Do not tell me that such people will be conciliated by the sacrifice of the Irish Church, for, the very moment when you are making the sacrifice—when you have the knife lifted prepared to slay—these people mock you, and say—“This is what we have forced from you; this is what we have made you do; these are the fruits of the blowing up of Clerkenwell.” The right hon. Gentleman shakes his head, but he (Mr. Gladstone) made the “intensity of Fenianism” a ground for his course last year. I hold in my hand an extract from the Cork Examiner, in which an advertisement appears to obtain funds for the Fenian convicts who had been released. In it occurs the following words, which manifest the truth of my remarks:—

“We would also remind those who look on the proposed disendowment of the Established Church as a boon, that—according to the statement of the present Premier—they are indebted to the Fenian movement for that tardy measure of justice.”

This shows the encouragement to disloyalty given by this measure. I admit that the Irish Church, though it never was before mentioned as a popular grievance by the Irish people generally and still less by the Fenians, as has been strongly urged by Dean Stanley, may have been an object of animosity to the Roman Catholic priests, and perhaps to some of the higher classes of Roman Catholics. I have received private letters which confirm me in this opinion, and from one I learn that, in one instance, a Roman Catholic paid his tithe rent-charge in full, without deducting the charge for tithes and rates, and on being made acquainted with the mistake, he wrote back to the clergyman, stating that he was perfectly willing to pay as he had done, and that he looked upon him as a great advantage to the parish in which he resided. If it had been the case of an absentee nobleman who never appears in his parish, he added, the case would have been very different, for they owed nothing to the absentee. That is the spirit in which the Protestant clergy are regarded by the populations among whom they live. The President of the Board of Trade drew an halcyon picture of what was to follow the passing of this Bill, and he did not, as on a former occasion, qualify his observations by saying that more must be done before the prospects he depicted could be realized. Last year, in a speech of wonderful ability, he stated that dealing with the Church alone would not effect the objects he had in view. In a speech of the right hon. Gentleman at Edinburgh, in November last, he spoke still more strongly, and his language appears to bear most materially on this question. We say that if you carry out this measure in its entirety, in many parts of Ireland there will be such an effect that the Protestants will be entirely overwhelmed so that, being as sheep without a shepherd, they will either remove from their parishes or become absorbed among the Roman Catholic population. Now, mark what the right hon. Gentleman said, pointing to a corollary to this Bill—something that is to follow it. He says that—

“In Ireland the land is not really in the possession of what I may call native proprietors or natives of the country, to a large extent. It seems to me to be an essential thing for the peace of every country that its soil should at least be in the possession of its own people. I believe that in Ireland it will be necessary to adopt some plan, and I believe there is a plan which can be adopted, without injury or wrong to any man, by which gradually the land of Ireland may be, to a considerable extent, transferred from the foreign, alien, or absentee Protestant proprietor,—transferred into the hands of the Catholic resident population of the country. I do not anticipate myself that until something of that kind is in process and in operation we shall find the tranquillity and content in Ireland, such as we would wish to see in it.”

MR. BRIGHT: I explained that.

MR. GATHORNE HARDY: When? Last night?

MR. BRIGHT: Last Session.

MR. GATHORNE HARDY: The right hon. Gentleman said the other night—and I give him full credit for it—that he would do nothing that is not approved by the principles of political economy. And no doubt he would treat these proprietors as Isaak Walton tells you to treat the frog—as if he loved them. He would not do them an injury consciously. If he removed them from their property it would be done in such a way as, in his opinion, to cause no injury to them. But what I cannot help remarking on is the object that is presented to the excitable minds of the population of Ireland when the advocacy of their cause has been taken up with such enormous ability as the right hon. Gentleman has shown—when he expresses himself in this way, and confines the expression even of absentees to Protestant landlords, and the gift of their lands, in whatever way, to Catholic residents the impression which must be produced is that he is going to assist them in Romanizing Ireland. Now, we who know the religious opinions of the right hon. Gentleman know that that cannot be his object; but I say the language used, carelessly—recklessly, in some sense, I may say—has its effect on the minds of the population of Ireland, and leads them to suppose that something will be done for them that you never can in justice do, and therefore the failure of their hopes and wishes will lead to more discontent, to more agrarian outrage and hostility. Now, Sir, a great deal of exasperation exists already. Do not let me place undue value upon the language used by persons in a moment of irritation; but I see with great regret that language has been used and spoken by men of high position—dignitaries of the Church and others. Some have written letters, and some have made addresses, in which they look forward to the repeal of the Union as a mode of healing discontent and of redressing the grievances under which they labour. I regret that such should be the case. Now when I say that such and such results will follow from the action of the right hon. Gentleman at the head of her Majesty's Government, I am told—"You are suggesting these things and putting them in the minds of people, and for any injury to the Church of England you are responsible." [Cheers.] The right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Gladstone) I observe, cheers me. By whom were they told to distrust the English Parliament, and to go in for repeal of the Union? Who suggested to them it was useless to seek redress from the English Parliament? It was a most remarkable thing if this were done by the right hon. Gentleman at the head of the Government. It is a very remarkable thing, because he has both written and spoken in that sense. He wrote this, moreover, in no state of exasperation. He did this in the first place when he was writing a book, again when he published a third edition, and again in his place in Parliament. The right hon. Gentleman might say, "Oh! I have repented of these things;" but still they have gone forth to the world, and remained, as far as the public knew, the opinions of the right hon. Gentleman, at least up to 1865. It is all very well to say that if we suggest these things and put them in people's heads we are responsible for them. In his work on Church and State, 3rd edit., p. 79-81, he says—

"A common form of faith binds Irish Protestants to ourselves, while they, on the other hand, are fast linked to Ireland; and thus they supply the most natural bond of connection between the countries. But if England by overthrowing their Church should weaken their moral position, they would no longer be able—perhaps no longer willing—to counteract the desires of the majority tending under the direction of their leaders—however by a wise policy revocable from that fatal course—to what is termed national independence."

In his place in Parliament on March 31, 1835, he says—

"The noble Lord (Lord John Russell) invited them to invade the property of the Church of Ireland. He considered that there were abundant reasons for maintaining that Church; and if it should be removed, he believed they would not long resist the repeal of the Union, and then they would become fully aware of the evil of surrendering the principle which the noble Lord asked them to give up."

These were the suggestions of the right hon. Gentleman, that what was going to be done would cause the people to cry out for national independence. That very result may happen. You cannot deal with people in a moment of great excitement as if they were chessmen, or as if they were people without passions or affections, for they may be hurried by that excitement into the utterance of words and commission of acts which they would deprecate in their cooler moments. And you may give rise to a cry for a repeal of the Union, backed up and sanctioned by those who have hitherto supported you. We said in the Address in answer to the Speech of Her Majesty, that we would endeavour to secure the action of "the undivided feeling and opinion of Ireland on the side of loyalty and law." Now, it does not seem to me that we are making a very good business of it at present. We have before us a measure of a "sweeping and severe" character, advocated in such harsh and unsympathizing terms by the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General for Ireland (Mr. Sullivan), spoken upon with such cold indifference by the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer:—I ask is there anything in the details of the Bill to modify or to soothe the feelings of those who consider themselves aggrieved by its operation? We have always heard that the best thing you can provide for an enemy is a golden bridge by which he can make his escape. By those who spoke last year on this subject we were told that the Church was to be treated with generosity. But I ask now whether, from end to end of the Bill, there is anything that in any sense represents the golden bridge of which I have spoken? You deprive the Irish Church of everything. As the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General said—"This is a Bill for disestablishment, not for giving them anything;" and the Chancellor of the Exchequer stated—"We deal with them liberally," but he was careful to explain that liberality of Liberals by no means means generosity. So much has been said upon the different points of the Bill that I will not attempt to discuss them. I will run them over rapidly. You give us the life interests—that you admit is the barest justice; but you combine with these conditions of the most arbitrary and inexcusable character. You endeavour to stereotype the Church of Ireland so that she cannot possibly move to benefit herself. But that is not the course which you take in the case of the life interests of the Presbyterian; he may remove where he likes, and take the money with him so long as he works for his Church. In the Church alone the clergyman is tied to the spot where he is placed, and you cannot remove him. Take the case of any particular man—a rector, say, of a parish, receiving £300 a year. You secure to him his salary for life, provided he remains there and performs the services; it may be, however, that he would be much more beneficially employed in the neighbouring town or parish, but he cannot go there without losing his annuity, which is taken from him the moment that he leaves. You therefore tie him down, as you tie down the curates also. What happens in their case? You give to them—I can hardly call it a life interest, but such an interest as you think they should have, and you give it to them on condition that they shall continue to serve in the same place; that is to say, you make a compulsory marriage between the rector and the curate. If the curate remove or should happen to die, the rector who was generous enough to employ him to meet the wants of the district suffers still further: he is deprived at the same time of the money and the curate. I say that is wrong—it is a wrong done both to the incumbent, to the curate, and to the Church.

Now as to capitalization. Though there has been many an invitation given to the Members of the Government, not one of them has addressed himself to that subject. Not one Member of the Government hitherto, though their attention has been specially called to it, has ventured to shape out such a capitalization of the revenues of the Irish Church under this Bill as will leave anything to that Church when the life interests are paid up; not a single fact has been laid before us which can induce us to form any such conclusions; and therefore we must assume that the Church is to go out naked into the world, with nothing but that £100,000—which you call £500,000—which my right hon. and learned Friend the Member for the University of Dublin (Dr. Ball) says the Church can really under the hard terms of your measure prove to belong to her. The churches, as shown by my right hon. and learned Friend, have had £600,000 of the private money of Church people spent upon them, in addition to what was spent out of the Church property; and as you cannot possibly separate one part of the church buildings from another, it follows that you must give over the churches to the Church Body; but here again the gift is clogged with harsh and restrictive conditions. The right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Gladstone) also spoke—and in this, I will not doubt he meant kindly by the Church and the Irish nation—of certain national monuments, and of something which was to be provided for their maintenance. I do not know whether he meant that those monuments were to be handed over absolutely to the Church, or were to be handed over with any trust attached to them, or subject to any control or conditions of resumption. My advice to the Church would be—accept nothing unless it is given to you absolutely, without control and without power of withdrawal. This was what the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Bright) said last year. He then told the House that what was given to the Church should be given in such a way that no vestige of control should be left to the State; no condition, no continuing trust—nothing that could be construed in any shape into a national endowment. Therefore, if you leave any fund to them, do it in such a shape that the Church may understand that the present Parliament mean to give it absolutely and for ever. I recommend the Church, if disestablished, to have nothing whatever to do with “national” property, because, as the nation has shown such an aptitude for taking what does not belong to it, it would be certain to finish by taking that property also which it would say did. I was much amused by seeing in one of the Irish newspapers that a parish priest, of considerable influence in his neighbourhood, speaks in such a manner so as to show how little you will gain by this measure, and how subjects are being reserved for future agitation. I have shown how two Bishops are reserving such subjects, and I will now show you how a parish priest is attempting to follow in their steps. In a letter written by the Rev. F. O'Reilly, he says—

“A Protestant church indeed a national monument! There is an old tree near this town, upon which it is said the Croppies used to be hanged long ago, and not so long ago either. It might as well be allowed to stand on the ground of its being a national monument. Believe me, that any remnant of the accursed Establishment in the hands of Protestants will never be looked on as a monument of anything but ascendancy, oppression, and injustice.”

Such are the hopes held out to the House by the parish priests, or, at all events, by this individual parish priest, of Ireland of what we are to expect when this Bill is passed. This priest tells the Protestant Church that “as soon as you have got possession of these churches I will endeavour to deprive you of them, because I regard it as a mockery to place any national monuments in the hands of the Protestant Church.” Then as to glebes, we have heard from the right hon.

Gentleman the Prime Minister that they may be purchased by the incumbents at their full value. Last Session the right hon. Gentleman said that the residences of the clergy, being inseparable from the churches, ought to be given upon the same conditions as the churches themselves. The right hon. Gentleman no doubt mean at that time to act graciously and generously towards the Irish clergy; but is it acting graciously and generously towards them to say that they may purchase the glebes at what is actually more than their full value? Look how you have dealt with Maynooth. This House some time since refused to pay the money for the repairs of Maynooth, the cost of which at the time was said to amount to £1,260 annually. The result has been that the College has got into debt to the amount of £20,000, and you are now going to pay that debt out of the funds of the Irish Church. I may say, without disrespect to the College, that this was a debt contracted in their own wrong, and contrary to the voice of Parliament, which said that it would not sanction such an obligation. You now intend to pay off this debt while making the Church buy up her own glebes, upon which the clergy have expended so much of their own money, at a cost of £232,000, or to pay for the sites upon which they stand. And this you call even-handed justice?

Now, Sir, the scheme for the purchase of the tithe rent-charge, I confess, is a puzzle that gives me a great deal of difficulty to comprehend. I do not affect to be a great financier; but, as I understand the scheme, a man is to obtain possession of £100 a year for ever by the payment of £100 a year for forty-five years. I do not wish to speak disrespectfully; but not being a great financier, it appears to me that by a sort of hocus pocus management, by entering something into a book, a man obtains a loan which he never gets, and pays interest which he never pays, and so he obtains at the end of forty-five years, £100 a year in perpetuity, without actually paying anything for it. Out of the £100 a year which he pays at present, £1 a year is to be sunk for forty-five years, at the end of which time the person who pays the money is to be relieved from further liability. Suppose you were to deal with a tenant in the same way, would it not be an ingenious method of enabling a tenant to purchase up his landlord's property? Now, suppose a tenant paid £100 a year rack-rent—and that you said, "You can pay the rent for forty-five years, your landlord making a sinking fund of it, and at the end of that time the land will be yours." I think that might be done by some of the gentlemen skilled in financial puzzles, and no doubt tenants anxious for fixity of tenure will remember this boon to the landlords. It appears to me that you are dealing unjustly in taking away from the Church what was intended for the service of God, and thus giving it to man for his own purposes. There is a question respecting rates now deducted from the tithe rent-charge which requires explanation; but it is a matter which, perhaps, it would not be worth while to go into now, and therefore I come to Maynooth. Now, with respect to Maynooth, I say that, leaving aside any prejudice with respect to its being a Roman Catholic establishment, or to its having been founded for purposes connected with religion, I cannot but express my opinion that you propose to treat Maynooth in a very different way from that in which you are about to treat the Established Church. There are in the College of Maynooth certain officers or professors who receive £6,000 a year. They may have a life interest; but can any one say that the students on the Dunboyne establishment, who receive £800 a year, and some hundreds of other students who are in Maynooth for only a short time have a life interest for which they ought to receive compensation? Why, it is a mockery; and, knowing it to be a mockery, something was held out in the shape of a threat to make the House consent to it. It was said in effect, "If you do not let us make this compensation to Maynooth, we must deal more harshly with Trinity College." Now, I do not want threats about the future; but I do want to know on what principle in this particular Bill life interests amounting to £6,000 a year are to be compensated for by £25,600 a year? I should like to know how that arrangement is consistent with the principle on which you propose to compensate the Church?—and I have no doubt the point is one to which the right hon. Gentleman will address himself. Then, you talk of a Church Body to take the place of the Established Church as a corporation, as if a Church Body was already an established thing in Ireland, and as if the Church there had not been maintained with the assistance of the State. You have forbidden to that Church convocations, synods, and free assemblies. Do you expect, then, that when this Bill passes, the 700,000 members of the Established Church will meet on the Curragh plains to elect representatives. They will have no power to bind a minority; they will have no power to bind the clergy. You leave them to their own devices I admit; but, giving them no power of binding any one, you call on them to be prepared as a corporation to deal with you in a few months. Why, nothing more difficult than the task you impose on them can well be imagined. I believe it is eighteen months—[Mr. BRIGHT: Yes, to the beginning of 1871.]—Very well. I believe the difficulty is one which cannot be easily surmounted; but it is one of those points which can hardly be discussed now, when we are dealing with the principle of the Bill, and I will pass on, especially as the matter was fully treated of by my hon. and learned Friend opposite.

And this brings me to the last point upon which I shall have to trouble the House. I certainly was rather amused, but not at all surprised, to find that the Chancellor of the Exchequer altogether abstained from saying a single word about the surplus. The right hon. Gentleman has lately been publishing his views upon endowments, and I cannot quite understand how it is that the right hon. Gentleman, who is gifted with such a tender conscience as to those with whom he acts, should agree in the proposal to make these new endowments, when he says that endowments contain within themselves the elements of failure and must bring down upon whatever is connected with them nothing but distress and confusion. We have heard the opinion of the hon. Member for Mayo (Mr. G. H. Moore), who can see nothing but probable waste and jobbery in what is now proposed. If these asylums are placed under local management, who does not know, when the money is found by others than those who are interested in these asylums, what sort of management that will be? I do not dwell upon the argument put forward by my noble Friend the Member for Middlesex (Lord George Hamilton) that in a great many instances you will be giving practically very large religious endowments. Into the question whether that is right or wrong I will not enter; but if, as I believe, that be the case, it is a violation of the pledges of the Government, and, instead of leading to harmony, can be productive of nothing but ill-will. But in this surplus there is a seizure for Imperial purposes. The State has paid for a great number of years the Regium Donum and the Maynooth Grant, and it is now proposed that these should cease, and that out of the revenues of the Irish Church £1,100,000 should be devoted to this new way of paying old debts. Now, is that payment of money for Irish purposes or for the relief of the Imperial Exchequer? It is absurd to suggest that such a payment is to be made for Irish purposes. And who is the author of this great scheme? It comes from a distinguished source. It does not belong to any Member of the Government, for it is the invention of a remarkable agitator, the great "Liberator"—it is the scheme of Mr. O'Connell, who suggested the plan in a letter which he wrote to Mr. Crawford in 1834, and which was quoted by Sir James Graham in the following year—

"My plan is to apply that fund in the various counties in Ireland, to relieve the occupiers of land from grand jury cess. My plan is to defray all the expenses of dispensaries, infirmaries, hospitals, and asylums, and to multiply the number of these institutions until they become quite sufficient for the wants of the sick."

That was the plan of Mr. O'Connell, and that is the plan which the Government have now adopted. The right hon. Gentleman opposite was then acting in harmony with Sir James Graham, who remarked upon it—

"That is to say that Church property is to be granted to the landlords of Ireland to enable them to do that which without confiscation they are bound to do by the law of humanity, if not by the law of the land—namely, to provide for the relief of their poorer brethren."

I do say by the course you are adopting you are virtually putting money into the hands of the landlords in Ireland. You are professing that the landlords, particularly the absentees, are the objects of your hostility, and something must be done to bring them to a better state; in the meantime, in order to pass this Bill, you give them this alleviation of the grand jury cess, and you also dry up the fountain of charity. I say when you are urging the adoption of the voluntary system, it is an unfortunate thing that the fountain of charity should be dried up by filling its place in this manner with money never intended for such charities, which never ought to be given to them, and, still more, ought never to be given in alleviation of that which, although it may be paid in the first instance by the occupier, is a charge upon the land. You have had it argued over and over again in this House, and I do not think the head of the Government will venture to say that in the result the county cess is not charged upon the land in Ireland. If it is, you are giving £8,000,000 in alleviation of that charge; and say you that that is just, either to the Church in Ireland, the people of Ireland, or anybody that is interested in the prosperity of Ireland? I now go from the details of the Bill in order to notice a point which I cannot pass by: it is the question of the principles which are laid down in this Bill as affecting the Empire generally. We have heard to-night a definition of religious equality; we heard many definitions of it last year; and practically they come to this—that no man has a right, as far as regards any political privilege, or civil privilege, or social privilege, to have anything given him by or preserved to him by the State which his fellow has not, whatever his religion may be. Well, I say it is impossible to confine that to Ireland—it is absolutely impossible. I know we are told when we say this we are bringing down upon the Church of England the very destruction which we say we apprehend; but it is impossible to fix the blame of that upon us. You may as well say that anybody who prophesies that a storm will follow a certain state of the atmosphere is bringing it upon himself. It is a consequence which follows this cause which you have put in operation, and which follows inevitably. If principles are applied to legislation for other parts of the Empire they cannot fail to be applied here, nor are there wanting here those who have avowed they will apply them. Hon. Members for Wales are eager to apply them, plenty of hon. Members for Scotland long to apply them, and in England there are those who hate any privilege, who are anxious to see those who are above them levelled in the dust, and who would pull down the Church of England with the greatest pleasure. I could quote Members of this House and newspapers in support of that assertion. A gentleman whom I quoted before, who is against the Irish Church, who wishes it to be dealt with much, though not exactly, in the same way as the right hon. Gentleman is dealing with it—Dr. Andrews, Vice President of the College at Belfast, whom, though I do not agree with him, I admire for his vigorous, terse, and pointed writing, says—

“The defenders of the Irish Church may justly complain that the artifices of party have never been more freely used than on this occasion. The Church of England has been assured that, living in the affections of the English people and commanding a majority of the inhabitants, she has nothing to fear from the removal of such an excrescence as the Irish Church. No one can value more highly than the writer the services rendered by the Church of England to the highest purposes of humanity, nor is anyone less anxious to disturb so grand and noble an edifice. But the course of events is inexorable, and the equality of all men in the eye of the law, irrespective of religious belief, is manifestly incompatible with the existence of a privileged caste. . . . The Established Church of Scotland is in some respects scarcely more defensible than that of Ireland. When the Irish Church falls, the days of the Scottish Establishment may easily be numbered. To declare that the fall of the Irish branch will not affect the stability of the Church of England is manifestly absurd; the arguments adduced in support of this paradoxical assertion carry weight with none except those who are willing to be deceived. There are stratagems in political as in actual warfare, and to lull the defenders of an ancient stronghold into false security by pacific assurances is the usual precursor of an intended attack. The party of action finds it convenient to suspend operations in England while their new allies require aid in the campaign they have opened in Ireland.”

In this I heartily concur; but, Sir, the issue becomes an awfully momentous one. Its results cannot, as I have said, be confined to Ireland; and, therefore, though I feel warmly as an advocate for that part of the Established Church which is situated in Ireland, I necessarily feel far more deeply interested in that part of the United Church of England and Ireland which does so much good in my own country. If it should happen that the disestablishment and disendowment now sought for should ensue, I foresee continual contests upon the painful subject of still further disestablishment. I foresee interminable discussions upon this subject in the House of Commons, which will give rise to irritation, exasperation, and bad feeling in the belief that we who have the privilege of an Establishment are hostile to the Dissenters, no matter that they are in no way injured by that Establishment enjoying the privileges which it has without any oppression, interference, or intolerance towards them. We are told we should trust in our cause, in the truth, and in all that we believe to be good in the Church to which we belong. Sir, I have never heard yet that you could fix the time at which a Church is to be prosperous, or at which it will arrive at the establishment of those truths it may profess. There may be many difficulties and trials through which it has to go, and although it is true, as my hon. and learned Friend has said—“Truth will prevail in the end,” yet we inquire when is the end? If we wait for this end, sure of its coming, it is not the less our duty to use those human aids and means by the withdrawal of which you may be in the mean time impeding the usefulness of our Church, and be detracting from its ability to do its work upon earth. You are even now inviting it to controversy about its temporalities instead of assisting it as you could. Many of you differ from the principle of its constitution; can you not differ without interfering with its operations, and leave it to its noble work, in which it was never more earnestly engaged than at present, the work of evangelizing the great masses of the people, too poor to build churches for themselves, too poor to be reached by your voluntary system, because they have not means to pay for pastors to live among them? Well, you have been decrying the Church in Ireland on the ground of inefficiency, and some have been speaking of the efficiency of the Church of Rome in Ireland. I will not speak of it as the Church of Rome. It is a Church, whatever may be its creed, acting with vast influence in Ireland. We were told by the Attorney General for Ireland that in the South of Ireland he could show us examples of devotion on the part of both priests and people such as we had never seen elsewhere. I believe him, indeed I have seen what he has described myself. The signs of devotion are unmistakable; crowds assemble round

the chapels, great numbers are hardly ever absent from them; the priests are among them, and have enormous influence over them; but has this influence, I am bound to ask, been exercised in the way in which it should be exercised? What means this general sympathy with crime, and the abettors of treason? In a case we heard of with sorrow in former days—the case, I think, of an attack upon the Rev. Marcus Beresford, who was fired at in his gig; having been missed the clergyman pursued the would-be assassins, but they threw off their coats in their flight, and were received by a crowd of worshippers coming from the Roman Catholic chapel, who all pulled off their coats in order that the guilty should not be discovered. Sir, though that may not be done now, yet what has been done? Does anyone believe that the perpetrators of the murders which have recently been committed in Tipperary are not known widely among the population? I speak it with sorrow, and in no degree in anger, but I lament with the deepest sorrow that the influence of the priests should be so little with these men—who come to their devotions, who kneel to them at confession, who are under their influence so much in other matters, that they should either sympathize with crime or conceal it—some of them having been witnesses of it and not revealing it, as they ought to do. I do not say this without warrant. I quote the words of a Roman Catholic Judge, Baron Deasy, pronounced in Tipperary not a month ago, in 1869, this year. He mentions several murders undetected and unpunished—

“So far as I can form any opinion, this failure of justice seems to arise from one of three causes—sympathy with the offender, sympathy with the crime, or terrorism which closes the mouths of witnesses. The present state of this riding presents a sad contrast to its condition on my former visit to it. Then tranquillity appeared to exist, but now it appears that beneath the surface there lies a spirit of lawlessness and turbulence which has developed into open crime. I cannot tell to what we have to attribute this turbulence (not distress or pressure—harvest abundant). There are no wrongs unredressed.”

Well, the cause of these crimes is not found in the Established Church—that Church which you are about to take away in order to restore tranquillity. They arise from something deeper and more lasting. They are found in that which began, not since the Protestant Church was established, but since the Celt and the Saxon race came into collision in Ireland, perhaps, long before. When the Church within the Pale was Roman as well as the Church without the Pale, I believe there was the same animosity, the same hostile feeling, between the two parties as exist at the present moment. Now, do you think by what you are proposing to do that you will get rid of that state of things which has been described by Baron Deasy in Tipperary, which has been confirmed by what has occurred at the election of Drogheda, as noticed by Mr. Justice Keogh, and in Galway, though not to the same extent? Do you think that what you propose will serve the interests of religion? I do not want to decry the Bishops and priests of Ireland, but I ask you does it subserve the true interests of religion in Ireland that from the altars, in the middle of what they consider the most solemn sacrifice of the Mass, election addresses should, by order of the Bishop, be delivered to the multitude? Can these things be done without giving a stimulus to discontent in the minds of the people, especially when accompanied by language alike strong with respect to the Church and to the land, such as misleads the people into the belief that they have grievances unredressed, though the Judge, in his solemn and impartial position, says there are no wrongs unredressed? Are you going to conciliate Ireland by giving a triumph to one party and by exasperating the other? Is it in this way you expect to secure “undivided loyalty and allegiance?” Is it in this way you think to bring Ireland to a peaceful condition? You say that because the endowments of the Church in Ireland have been for centuries alienated from the Roman Catholics they have never forgotten the wrong, that it rankles in their breasts, and prevents peace and tranquillity from prevailing in Ireland, and yet in the same breath you propose to those who have had these endowments for 300 years, who believe that they have a right to them, that they have been guaranteed to them by treaties—sanctioned by Acts of Parliament—sanctioned also by the language of the first Statesmen of this country, by those who have filled the highest offices—sanctioned also after the Emancipation Bill by the oaths of prelates, by the declarations of canonists, by the oaths of Members of Parliament—now, I admit, abolished—in trust that they would feel something of what they had professed on former occasions—you propose to sweep all these things aside and to make naked and desolate the Church which you have placed in that position. I look in vain in the speeches made at those meetings where the wrongs of Ireland are dilated upon for a statement of those wrongs. I find only a funeral wail over the departed greatness of Ireland, a greatness which never existed, and over the glories of Ireland in the Dark Ages, which glories were never seen. That sunburst, if it is meant to represent the glories of Ireland in former days ought rather to be the burst of a shell, which was scattering devastation and ruin in every direction, for that was the state of Ireland at that time. Then they go back to the Penal Laws, but those wrongs have been redressed. What, in point of fact, is it that those speeches complain of? The complaint, and it is made in every speech, is that which was whispered to us to-night by the hon. Member for Tralee (The O'Donoghue) — it is of Imperial legislation, and what they want is that Ireland shall be free from what they term the domination of England. If you ask what their needs are, that is a very different thing from their grievances. Their needs are absolutely little. What have we in England? We have absolute freedom of speech. Well, they have it in Ireland; yes, and with a license such as is not exhibited in this country. Is there any honest act which cannot be performed in Ireland as freely as in England? Is the Press free? If not, I do not know what licentiousness means. Trade and commerce are as free as in England. In times past there were wrongs connected with trade and commerce; but there is now absolute freedom. Manufactures flourish now in places where they did not flourish before. Look at the commercial activity of the North of Ireland, and I do not see why Cork and Limerick, and other cities in the South, if the people were only quiet and peaceable, should not present the same gratifying spectacle as Belfast and the towns in the North: manufactures, industry, everything is free. Is agriculture improved? We know that it is. All the Returns on the table show that it is. What does that indicate? That habits are improving. Peace, tranquillity, freedom from agitation, good habits of industry for a few years — these would do far more good than insane and revolutionary measures. I say also that there is absolute freedom. You say there is not religious equality. I grant it to a man who holds that there ought to be an established religion connected with the State must admit that it is in a different position from creeds that have been established. But in what way does it interfere with your religious freedom? Or how, again, does it interfere with your social equality? The Roman Catholic gentry in Ireland mingle on equal terms with the Protestant gentry in the country; although unfortunately in some instances, where the squires have been living on familiar terms with the Catholic priests in their parishes, a shadow has intervened from a Protestant but priestly, or from a copal or some higher quarter; a pariah priest who would gladly have familiar intercourse with his Protestant neighbour, has bowed and passed coldly by, regretting that he is ordered not to continue on such relationships. I say, Sir, that the danger which you are incurring is the danger of yielding to sedition and rebellion. That is the danger. It is mischief to the people of Ireland. You are hoping which you can never realize. Well, the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Bright) said he trusted that would come when I should receive the opinion I expressed and see this brighter light.

Sir, if I believed that the measures which we are engaged in would ensure which the right hon. Gentleman recommends us to follow it with a view to bring peace to Ireland, that the united sections so long divided, that would enable religion to be introduced without at the same time introducing violence and acrimony — if all things could be done, I should begin to distrust the opinions which I have expressed. As the prophet said — “If thou return at all in peace, I will admit that in that event no peace was uttered by him, so I will say if peace ensues — although I do not think there is any chance of its ensuing at this time — but if peace should ensue from these measures, then I shall be wrong in the opinion I have expressed, and I shall also have wronged those who

been instrumental in promoting them. I have not endeavoured to quote passages to show that any one differs now from the sentiments which he may have formerly uttered. I will try to believe, I wish to believe, that those who have engaged in a work so great, so awful as this must have measured the task before they undertook it, and cannot have undertaken it in any party or any mere capitious spirit. I trust they are doing it from a higher and nobler motive. I will believe that is the case. I trust they will also give us credit—although we may not be among those whom they speak of as thoughtful and philosophical—for real, and sincere, and genuine feelings on behalf of the institutions which we seek to defend. Sir, if that peace should occur in my time, following and consequent upon this measure, I trust I should have the candour to say that I believed it. I do not expect that I shall be called upon to do so; but when I find that by this Bill the principle of Establishments is destroyed—when I find endowments, which I believe are sacred to the service of Almighty God, given to purposes for which they were never intended, and taken away from those who have done no wrong and who have left nothing undone that justifies the perpetration of such an act—when I find, as I believe, that division and strife are imminent, that you will exasperate those from whom you take them, and that those who are exulting in the deprivation of others will themselves not be satisfied with what you do for them—when I see good reason to fear that oppression and isolation await many of my poor Church brethren in Ireland—when (as I know has happened in districts in Canada) Protestants are likely to be obliged to retire from amid the dense Roman Catholic population around them, or when left, without clergy to look after them, be absorbed in the Roman Catholic body—when, as I believe also, distrust in English legislation will be created in the minds of all, and especially in the minds of the possessors of property in Ireland, and that, at the same time, a hope for things which English legislation never can do will be excited in the breasts of others—then, I say to myself, that I accept the responsibility which the right hon. Gentleman has imposed upon us all in the opening of his speech on the 1st of March; and, believing as I do, that, to the best of my judgment and to the best of the light of my conscience, that this Bill is alike wrong in the sight of God and against the interests of my country, I do not hesitate to denounce and oppose this sacrilegious measure.

MR. GLADSTONE: Mr. Speaker, I think, Sir, that both sides of the House must be agreed at least in this—that the right hon. Gentleman who has just sat down has drawn a picture of the state of Ireland which is equally remarkable and deplorable. The right hon. Gentleman's picture consists of two parts. On the one side he looks at the system of law, government, and institutions in Ireland, and there all is well. On the other hand, he looks at the people of Ireland—at the religion of the people of Ireland, at the relations between the people of Ireland and the ministers of their religion, and there, unfortunately, all is ill. Mr. Burke said in one of his memorable compositions that he did not know how to bring an indictment against a nation. For bringing an indictment against a nation commend me to the right hon. Gentleman. Irish grievances—where are they? The right hon. Gentleman says he looks in vain for the grievances of Ireland. On the state of land tenure the right hon. Gentleman has nothing to say, except to indulge in criticisms on the language of my right hon. Friend the President of the Board of Trade. With regard to the Established Church of Ireland, though theoretically it may involve some departure from religious equality, has he not proved to us that it is a great blessing to that country? Has he not told us, grossly, as I think, though no doubt unintentionally, misinterpreting the terms used by a Judge, that in Ireland there are no wrongs unredressed? And yet what does he complain of? Of the wholesale sympathy on the part of the great part of the population with Fenian agitators and criminals. Of sympathy, not only with political, but with private crime; and in the relations between the people and their clergy the right hon. Gentleman can see nothing but influence misused. This is the state of things which he depicts as existing in Ireland; and I ask him, where are his remedies? The picture which he presents to us is, so far as the Irish people are concerned, nothing but a picture of black despair. He speaks of promoting the repeal of the Union, and because some clergyman in Ireland, dignified, it appears, by the title of archdeacon, has lately become a Repealer, the right hon. Gentleman, searching for the cause of this strange opinion, thinks it can be found nowhere except in a line and a half of a speech delivered by myself some thirty-three years ago. There are, however, I would remind him, other modes of promoting a repeal of the Union, and of these no mode is so cogent in its effect in tending to bring about what I, for one, must regard as so deplorable a result, as that which is made use of by an English Statesman who gives us such highly-coloured statements with respect to the condition of the Irish people, as to the origin of which he has, it seems to me, furnished us with a most inaccurate account. By leaving on record his charges against the Irish people with his vindication of the Government and laws of this country, he does, I cannot help feeling, all that in him lies to drive that people to despair. The right hon. Gentleman reminds us that the Fenians have not asked for the abolition of the Church in Ireland. No, that is very true; so far as that goes, the Fenians and the right hon. Gentleman are exactly in the same position. ["Oh!"] In precisely the same position, I was about to say, with respect to that demand. I hope I was not understood as imputing it to the right hon. Gentleman for a moment that he does not support the Irish Church Establishment from the most honourable and conscientious, though I think, mistaken motives. The Fenians, differing from him entirely in their views with respect to that Church, are the very last persons to demand its abolition, because it serves their purpose that it should remain as it now stands. Whatever serves to estrange the minds of the Irish population from Imperial rule, British sympathies, and from their Protestant fellow-countrymen on both sides of the water, is of all things the most precious part of the Fenian stock-in-trade, and it would ill suit their purpose indeed to ask to have the Church in Ireland abolished. The right hon. Gentleman at the commencement of his speech vindicated, as I thought, with perfect propriety, his right to overlook, that is to go back beyond, the occurrences of the last twelve or fifteen months, to argue this question as if it were a new

question, as if there had been no vote of the last Parliament, as if there had been no declaration of the national conviction at the election, as if there had been no resignation of the late Government, no abandonment of Office by the right hon. Gentleman himself without soliciting the judgment of the House of Commons, because the opinions and principles on which he sought to govern Ireland, and which he has set forth with great force to-night, were opinions and principles which he knew could not be accepted by the country. I might, indeed, say, as far as the right hon. Gentleman is concerned, it appears, after all, that the appeal made the other night by my right hon. Friend the President of the Board of Trade was utterly vain—for, with respect to the right hon. Gentleman, there is no Irish crisis and there is no Irish question. All he says we want is a few years of peaceful industry, as though peaceful industry can be adopted at a moment's notice by a whole people; or else, if not so adopted, the entire responsibility of the want of it, and of the evils that may ensue, rests with that people itself, and in no respect with those under whose tutelage, under whose care, and under whose Government that people has been for the last 600 years. Upon this point the right hon. Gentleman has materially retrograded. For him there is no Irish question now, but surely there was an Irish question last year when he was a Member of a Cabinet sitting upon this Bench, and heard in silence the speech of Lord Mayo, also a Member of that Cabinet, in which Lord Mayo asserted the gravity of this Irish question, and did not tell us that we were to bring home to the door of the Irish peasant, and there leave, the whole charge of the evils and mischief with which Ireland teems. Surely there was an Irish question when the right hon. Gentleman heard Lord Mayo tell us that he thought the state of the land question so grave that he should introduce a Bill on the following Monday—though unfortunately we never saw the Bill—giving to Irish tenants compensation for their improvements; and when, with respect to education, he told us that the time was come when it would be well to found a Roman Catholic University, supported from the Consolidated Fund; and when, thirdly, with respect to the Church question, so far from seeing that happy, beneficent state of things which the right hon. Gentleman delights to contemplate, he said that there were serious evils, that the absence of religious equality was a grievance, and that there would be no objection to remove that grievance and that religious inequality, provided it were done by the endowment of new Churches and not by the disendowment of old ones. I am sorry to remind the right hon. Gentleman in this somewhat pointed manner of the difference of his conduct now, when he is loosened from the trammels of Office, and enjoys the freedom of Opposition. The right hon. Gentleman, having recovered his freedom, makes a very liberal use of it, for he seems to think that he has nothing to do but to state that if there have been any evils connected with the people of Ireland they have been removed long ago, and that it is invidious to lead us to believe that any of the evils remain, and further that if, in fact, there are any evils remaining, no part of the responsibility rests with us, and that the whole responsibility is upon the shoulders of the people of Ireland and of her clergy. Our situation, certainly, is broadly different from that of the right hon. Gentleman. He draws this hopeless picture, and for it he does not offer even the shadow of a remedy; but he hinted that he had a right to assume that some measure would pass to put the Church Establishment in Ireland in a satisfactory condition. If I may say so without offence, I think that this is a most audacious assumption to be made by a public man. Not to cite any measure, carefully to avoid identifying himself with its provisions, in no way explaining the propositions which he would have brought forward, making himself responsible for nothing, not having said so much as this—that evils of any kind would have been redressed by it, the right hon. Gentleman thinks that he is entitled to assume that a measure has been imagined and invented, and which, if he has imagined and invented it, he takes care not to describe, and that having been so imagined and invented would have been passed into a law, and that it would have had an operation which would be for the purposes of his argument and for those purposes alone. I think that I am justified in saying that the right hon. Gentleman offers us nothing. He has presented to us a sad and grievous picture; but I think it is so unjust to the people of Ireland as to amount to a libel on their character. He has nothing to suggest or promise by way of producing a better state of things beyond that salutary precept that he inculcates that habits of industry, and a uniform regard for the laws should be adopted by the people. Our position is very different. We do not see in the state of Ireland anything but the aggravated result of the inveterate mischiefs which raged with fury in these islands until within the last generation, and which, though abated in many and important respects, have left behind so much of painful and angry recollections, and so much also of actual difficulty and suffering and grievance—while as yet no sufficient attempt has been made to apply a remedy, that we have had reason to regard the condition of Ireland as a problem beyond our powers to solve. We have, of course, as the people of Ireland have, to lament, and as everyone has to lament in himself the corruptions, the impurities, and the weaknesses of human nature; but those imperfections have been found in equal proportion in their rulers, and it is an axiom in politics that where these inveterate mischiefs prevail, and have prevailed for centuries, the final judgment of posterity, and the sentence of just men will be that the chief responsibility lies where the chief power has been—with the rulers of the country, and with the classes possessing property in it. We, therefore, Sir attempt to propose a remedy, and that remedy the right hon. Gentleman knows must be proposed piecemeal. We cannot lay upon the table at one and the same moment all the measures for which the state of Ireland appears to us to call. We come forward, therefore, with a Bill for the purpose of disestablishing and disendowing the now Established Church of Ireland. Of course, it was to be expected that the right hon. Gentleman would be merciless and unsparing in his criticisms on the details of the Bill. I am sorry it has not been better understood. He complains, for example—and that was the main head of his complaint—that the annuities we offered to incumbents are accompanied with conditions of service. Has he inquired of his friends in the Irish Church how they would have liked that those annuities should be absolutely given? No, Sir, he has not; at least, I will venture to say he knows not the sentiment in the Irish Church on the subject. But it has been our duty to make inquiry into the matter, and the truth is that, consistently with the very sentiments expressed by the right hon. Gentleman near me, and which he thinks we have abjured, we do attach conditions of service to the annuities of incumbents for the sake of their congregations—[“Oh, oh!”]—yes, for the sake of their congregations, who, we thought, had a right to retain the benefit of their labours, and for the sake of the religious body with which they are connected, and we think that if we had proposed these annuities without conditions, and knowing that to be the general opinion, we should have done much to disorganize and possibly to destroy. But if the right hon. Gentleman opposite wishes to bring this particular matter to a test, let him give notice of a Motion in Committee to substitute for the proposition we make an unconditional, instead of a conditional, annuity, and I venture to say he will find himself mistaken as to the result.

MR. GATHORNE HARDY: You did not let the incumbent take other preferment.

MR. GLADSTONE: I say he can take other preferment in concert with the authorities of his Church. Without any interference from us to settle with the authorities of his Church the terms of his commutation, he may retain his right under it to the end, and take any preferment he likes. I therefore challenge the right hon. Gentleman to give notice of the Amendment at which he has glanced, when we shall see what left-handed service he has been endeavouring to give to his friends in the Irish Church, in whom he, no doubt, takes a great interest. The House may be assured that I will not follow the right hon. Gentleman in detail over the extensive ground he has traversed in his able speech. I think that, so far as criticisms on the details are concerned, there are none of them on which we are to give our opinion to-night can possibly depend, and therefore it is better to let them pass by in the fewest words. I will only say that I think when we come into Committee it will not be found practicable to induce the House to see, as he sees, that in the £350,000 or £400,000

—it is somewhere between the two— which the 4,500,000 of Roman Catholics in Ireland may get out of this arrangement, there is any monstrous or undue favouritism, while the £6,500,000, besides the churches and glebe houses, may go to the ministers or servants of the Church, or the body representing it. There is nothing to be read but the evidence of our harshness and injustice. With regard to the disputed question of the date of the private endowments of 1660, I know very well that this is a matter on which much may be said pro and con. But I own to my belief that if the opponents of this Bill succeed in shaking the conviction I entertain with regard to the propriety of the choice of that epoch, I, for one, am more likely to be shaken in the sense of doubting whether we ought to go so far back than in the sense of raising the question of being driven back farther. I may claim to know something of the matter when I am stating what are likely to be the processes of my own mind. I am not so audacious as to assume that the processes of the minds of hon. Gentlemen opposite may sympathize with my own. Several Gentlemen said that it would be extremely unjust to charge the Maynooth compensation and the Regium Donum upon the Church Fund of Ireland rather than upon the Consolidated Fund of this country. It has also been said that the proceeding we have adopted is not in conformity with the pledges we have given, and some have said, I think, with the Preamble of the Bill. At the proper time we shall be able to show that this proceeding is in strict conformity with all the words that we have spoken, and with the Preamble of the Bill. Neither of these things, perhaps, much affects the merits of the question; but upon the merits we shall state to the House at the proper time the reasons—and I think they are sufficient and conclusive reasons—which have led us to propose that these compensations should be paid out of the Church Fund of Ireland. Without in any manner raising a prejudice to the question which the Irish Members may think fit to found on the subject of a claim on the Consolidated Fund, or any other claim of a financial kind on behalf of that country, that is not one of the corner stones of the Bill. I do think that justice requires us to hold firmly—subject always to considerations of mere detail—by the moderate compensation we propose for Roman Catholics and Presbyterians; but as regards the question of the source from which those compensations are to be derived, there is no such foregone conclusion, I presume to say, in the minds of the Government as to prevent the fairest and freest discussion of the question.

So much for the criticism upon our plan in its details. What is far more important is to consider what are the plans or methods, if any, that have been placed in competition with the plan of the Government as the best method of dealing with the great ecclesiastical difficulty of Ireland. And I have shown that the right hon. Gentleman who has just sat down has no method whatever. Nor can I fail to remark one most extraordinary circumstance. It will be remembered that upon every occasion, during the debates of last year, our conduct in proposing Resolutions and legislation with respect to the Irish Church, was denounced by Gentlemen opposite, not only as unwise, but as eminently factious. And what was the reason adduced in proof that our conduct was thus factious? It was this—that the question of the Irish Church had been referred to a Royal Commission, that the Commission was to produce a plan for its settlement, and we, without waiting for their plan, insisted upon propositions of our own. That was the proof of the factious character of our conduct. At different times during the Session—when I suppose it was thought expedient in connection with the progress of debate—hopes were held out that the Commission was very hard at work, and likely to report—I remember the Home Secretary promising—almost immediately. However, we were not drawn off from the track; and I am thankful to say we went on with our work, and performed it, as to all that depended upon us, giving thereby to the country those pledges of the reality and solidity of our intentions which enabled the country to meet us in a corresponding spirit, resulting in that manifestation of the national will of which we are to look for another sign in the division of to-night. The Report of the Commission has appeared. No doubt, every Gentleman on that side has read not only the Report, but the whole of the Schedules. They must, every one of them, be intimately acquainted with it, and yet not a man in this debate has ventured to set up as a mode of dealing with the Church question of Ireland the plan proposed by the Report of the Commission. Surely that is a fact remarkable enough in itself; but it is more remarkable still when you consider whom you have got in the House—not the official head of the Commission, but its working mind. Great injustice is done to the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for Dublin University (Dr. Ball) if he is not the father of that Report. And yet, with a total absence of parental feeling he delivers, for two hours, a speech of the utmost ability and learning in this House, going over everything, condemning on this side, approving on that, having a word to say for all things and for everybody, except for the Report of his own Commission. Really, Sir, if it were possible for an inanimate production to be conscious of that sort of compassion which we ought to bestow on the woes and miseries of a fellow-creature, I should feel it all for the Report of this Commission. Ushered into the world with promissings and trumpetings sufficient for a Royal birth—the period for the preparation of its entering into light equal to that taken by the longest-lived animals in the business of gestation—it was considered by every member of the great party then constituting the Government to be certain to contain in itself the means of solving this most difficult problem; then to issue forth, and to be brought into the light, to be treated worse than the child of a beggar woman, for even such a child would be looked after by the parish—this Report seems to be put behind the fire, and the act of murder is performed by the hands of the father. The Report of the Commission, however, would not have attracted this kind of criticism for the purpose of attempting to fix anything in the nature of ridicule upon the labours of the persons who composed that Commission. They have failed, and failed egregiously, not from their own fault, but because they undertook a hopeless problem. They undertook the task of reforming that which is irreformable—that which you cannot reform in one sense without worsening its case in, perhaps, twenty other senses. If they committed an error, it was in undertaking to examine the question of re-constructing an institution like the Established Church in Ireland, that has entirely outlived its day. It had outlived its day, in my opinion, when it became evident that the plans of Queen Elizabeth could not possibly be fulfilled for the conversion of the people of Ireland to the Protestant religion. They may have erred in this respect. But I refer to this Report because the plans it has proposed represent to us the utmost and the best that the ablest man can do, fortified with Government authority, having the advantage of a lengthened period of time for consideration, and of unbroken consultation; and when such a Report as this proceeds from such men as these, and is so treated by its parents, I say we are justified, if ever there was a negative demonstration in the world, in saying that the time has come when every man standing on this floor is entitled and bound to say that what is called the reform of the Church of Ireland, by cutting and clipping and paring, by talking away a little here, and putting in a little there, and shifting money from one part of the country to another, has become utterly hopeless, and ought to be discarded from the category of those objects which are to be taken into the view of practical politicians. The right hon. and learned Gentleman, I must say, I think, treated the Report more favourably than the right hon. Gentleman who has just sat down, for he did point out methods of proceeding in Ireland. The right hon. Gentleman disclaimed any intention of offering any disrespect to the Roman Catholics in Ireland. I accept that disclaimer in good part—it was most sincerely offered, and not only offered, but proved; because the right hon. Gentleman instead of that niggardly line of comment, so to call it, which has been adopted by the right hon. Gentleman the late Home Secretary, who thinks he can possibly scrape two or three years from the Maynooth compensation, commented not only in a different but in a contradictory sense, and said that the proposal in respect of Maynooth was insufficient and ungenerous. The right hon. Gentleman announced pretty distinctly a mode of dealing with the Church question in Ireland. I think that he was in some degree, in this matter, a disciple of the school of reticence, but he certainly went beyond the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Buckinghamshire. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Buckinghamshire last year did not express his opinions at the time when we heard that speech from Lord Mayo; but he has been extremely cautious and cir-cumspect with regard to the repetition of those opinions ever since. Sir, when we cannot live on the food placed upon the table we must live on the crumbs that fall from it. In dealing with the real substantial and responsible scheme of the Government for dealing with the Irish Church, it is a matter of great importance to know whether any hon. Gentlemen, and especially hon. Gentlemen opposite, have on any occasion brought any scheme into competition with it. The hon. Member for Mayo (Mr. Moore), speaking his mind like a man, said that he tended towards an endowment of the three Churches—a general endowment; and my hon. Friend the Member for Galway (Mr. Gregory), with that frankness and courage which he always displays, avowed that this plan of general endowment was the plan and the policy which he would prefer, though I think he added that it was now too late to propose it. There can, therefore, be no room for hesitation or doubt as to the policy of those two hon. Gentlemen, though both I think accompanied their opinions with the expression of a fear that the time for its establishment had gone by. But when I come to the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Buckinghamshire, I found much greater difficulty in understanding what he means; because he said that one of the great causes—indeed, it was the only cause he mentioned—of the discontent and disorder in Ireland was the complaint that she had one unendowed Church and clergy. He went on to say that, if this Bill passed instead of having one unendowed Church and clergy we should have three, and he suggested that this, instead of being a remedy for a mischief, would be a means of aggravating it. I am therefore driven to the conclusion that either the right hon. Gentleman, like his Colleague who sits near him (Mr. Gathorne Hardy), has no plan for dealing with the Church of Ireland or that, if he has a plan, it is the same one as was announced by his Government from these Benches twelve months ago—the plan vulgarly called “levelling up”—leaving the Established Church her endowments, raising the endowments of the Presbyterians to a worthier standard, and combining that with a liberal endowment for the Roman Catholic Church in Ireland. This, at all events, I am safe in saying is the only plan indicated from the other side. I have heard very nearly the whole of this debate, and if any hon. Gentleman has intimated a latent kindness for the Report of the Commission, and I have done him a wrong in supposing that no one has given such an intimation, I hope he will forgive me; but, as far as I am aware, the plan of endowing the three Churches, which must, of course, be accompanied by some scheme of endowment for the Methodists and other sects, is the only one — I will not say laid down — but glanced at or insinuated as a rival to the plan of the Government. What are we to say to that plan? It is to be disposed of very briefly. A phrase has come into use among some of the Irish clergy. Some of them say—"We are prepared to accept the inevitable," but I have not heard that any of them have said—"We are prepared to accept the impossible." If this plan of the three Churches was really entertained by the right hon. Gentleman, why was it not announced at the hustings—at those hustings where every effort was made to represent us as being in secret league with the Pope of Rome, and when the honour and credit of Protestantism were in nearly every case—to his honour, I except the name of the right hon. and gallant Gentleman the Member for North Lancashire (Colonel Wilson-Patten) — sought to be monopolized by the party opposite? Why was not this plan, which is the only one about which they have ventured to hint as a remedy for the Church difficulties of Ireland, proposed, or at least mentioned, at the hustings? The voices were very inarticulate voices, and it is either the plan of the party opposite—in which case, as it is an impossible plan, it is needless to discuss it—or they have no plan at all. My hon. and learned Friend the Member for Richmond (Sir Roundell Palmer) came to the rescue, and he certainly proposed a plan, and this plan, the product of a mind as ingenuous as it is powerful and accomplished, was received as a kind of godsend by a large number of hon. Gentlemen opposite. As every suggestion made by my hon. and learned Friend is entitled to respectful consideration, I shall not apologize for advertising to the character of that plan even at this late hour. The opinions of my hon. and learned Friend were the more important, because his doctrine of property has been much accepted by authorities and speakers on the other side of the House, and because of the general cheering with which his declaration was greeted. I understand the fundamental doctrine of my hon. and learned Friend to be that property given for the purposes and use of a portion of the community ought not to be withdrawn from that portion of the community except in certain definite cases. One of those cases I understood to be where the property was excessive in amount, in which case, according to my hon. and learned Friend, it might be reduced. Another definite case was when the purpose to which the property was addressed was either absurd or bad in itself. And my hon. and learned Friend, I think, finally glanced at a third cause which would justify the interposition of the Legislature—such misconduct in the administration of the funds as would be sufficient to warrant a forfeiture. Though I think that enumeration very well as far as it goes, I must claim on the part of the Legislature a larger and more extended right, and acknowledge myself bound by a much more comprehensive duty. It seems to me that when property has been given for a purpose that is not attained, and that cannot be attained, it is then the duty of the Legislature to see that that property is no longer wasted. I am putting the matter low, because, instead of being no longer wasted, if I were to state the full justification of our measure it would be rather this—where, even without the fault of the parties immediately concerned, the actual use and administration of a property, being totally different from that for which it is given, is likewise attended with the gravest political and social mischiefs, then the obligation of the Legislature to interfere is imperative. So far I listened with satisfaction to the speech of the hon. and learned Gentleman, for he rose above the purely legal doctrine of trust, and claimed that there was a trust for the whole community of the Church. I agree with the hon. and learned Gentleman in his extension of the doctrine; but I ask him to go with me to extend it still further, and to say there is a trust—whether in the legal sense I know not—but in the political, the social, the moral sense there is a trust impressed upon this property, from first to last, for the benefit of the nation. It was for the nation that the property was given. It is true it was given to corporations. Yes; but why? Not that they might enjoy it as private property, but that they might hold it on condition of duty. They were, as the hon. and learned Gentleman truly says, only convenient symbols — convenient media for its conveyance from generation to generation. The real meaning, scope, and object was that through them it should be applied for all time to the benefit of the entire population of the kingdom, and this was a natural and intelligent arrangement when the entire nation was of one faith. In proportion as Dissent and difference of opinion creep into the country, the foundation of the religious Establishment so endowed comes to be by degrees more or less weakened and impaired, partly in proportion as the number of Dissenters is strong, partly in proportion as they are disposed or not disposed to acquiesce in the continuance of the Establishment. But when we come to a case like that of Ireland; when that which was given for the whole people has come to be appropriated for the enjoyment of a mere handful of the people; and when at the same time the property so enjoyed, while it remains in the hands of those who now hold it, is associated with the recollection of all the grievances and bitter misfortunes that have afflicted that country, so that the chain of the ecclesiastical and civil history of Ireland consists in fact of two strands, one of which cannot possibly be unwound and separated from the other, I must decline to go into any court of justice, created for the purpose of administering the laws, in order to ascertain the rules by which they are bound. We are called to a function and avocation which, in my opinion, is a yet higher one; we are to look for the principles of right in a broader, and, for such a case, a truer aspect, and from that responsibility we cannot escape. We ought to be grateful to my hon. and learned Friend for the distance in respect of that portion of our journey which he is content to travel in our company, because, considering the hard words of which we are the object, I think it requires some courage on his part to acknowledge us and to recognize us in any degree. My hon. and learned Friend gives up the Establishment of the Church. I do not wonder that my right hon. Friend the Member for the University of Cambridge (Mr. Walpole) entered a protest on this subject. In giving up the establishment of the Church my hon. and learned

Mr. Gladstone

Friend gives up the greater part, and I think the higher part, I am bound to say the higher and the worthier part, of the whole argument. All that relates to the consecration of the State by its union with the Church—all that relates to the supremacy of the Crown—all that relates to the constitutional argument as well as to the religious argument, disappears along with disestablishment; and my hon. and learned Friend becomes open to that withering accusation which was delivered in a moment of extraordinary fervour by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Buckinghamshire last year, when he described that awful conspiracy between Romanists and Ritualists for undermining the Throne by the denial of the Royal supremacy. But permit me to say the Royal supremacy is not denied or taken away by this Bill. The Royal supremacy has been developed in various forms at various periods of our history. It is the greatest mistake to suppose that since the Reformation the Royal supremacy has always been flowing, as it were, through the same channel. Most important and vital changes have been made with respect to the methods of its operation; but I know of no legal or authoritative definition of the Law of Supremacy, except it be that which describes it as the fundamental principle which makes the Sovereign of this country supreme over all persons and in all causes ecclesiastical as well as civil. That which is an ecclesiastical cause at one period of our history may not be an ecclesiastical cause at another period of our history; that which was an ecclesiastical cause before the Court of High Commission has no existence as such in the present generation; but as long as the Queen is supreme in every cause that can be brought into a court for the purpose whether of primary adjudication or of review, so long the Royal supremacy exists. If anyone be prepared to question that doctrine, I ask them whether the Royal supremacy exists in Scotland at this moment or not? If you hold that by this Bill the Royal supremacy is set aside, I defy you to maintain that there is a single rag or thread of Royal supremacy in Scotland. My hon. and learned Friend is prepared—I do not say that he proposes—but he is prepared to give up the estates of the sees, the property of the Commissioners, and he says he is prepared to give up certain of the parochial endowments of benefices. Of course, it would be impossible to fix any figure off-hand with precision; but I believe he confined these cases of parochial endowments to populations of 200 persons. Whether he intended to reserve out of the revenues of these benefices any portion for the supply of spiritual instruction and ordinances I do not know, and I do not think he said; but in this way my hon. and learned Friend gives up one-third of the Church property of Ireland, and he proposes to retain the rest upon a rule which is, at any rate perfectly intelligible.

SIR ROUNDELL PALMER intimated that he would thus dispose of about one-half of that property.

MR. GLADSTONE: I am extremely glad to hear it is one-half instead of a third. I am delighted to hear he accompanies us only one inch further on our road. It gives me hope that possibly some day he will greatly improve his fractions. But my hon. and learned Friend would retain the endowments in those cases where there is what I may call a congregation, not as denying that twenty people, or even ten people, may be a Christian congregation; but, using the expression in the sense that he employs it when he speaks of "a substantive congregation," of which he thinks the law may take notice and cognizance. In this case my hon. and learned Friend would retain the endowments. The first question which I should like to ask my hon. and learned Friend is, whether there is upon the face of the earth, or in the history of legislation, any precedent for such a proceeding as he proposes? and the reason I put that question to him is because he put that question to us. Now, I think it is quite plain that he has no precedent for it. I would not, however, condemn it on that ground alone, because in the circumstances of Ireland, such as they are, we are dealing with a case for which, I believe, there is no precedent in the civilized world. My hon. and learned Friend certainly will not tell me that the case in which the courts of the United States adjudged to the Episcopal Church of New York the property of which, I believe, the value at the time of the adjudication was somewhere about £2,000 a year—my hon. and learned Friend, I say, will not tell me that that was a case in point; especially upon this ground, that although that was a proof of a great regard of the American Government for corporate property, it was not property which had belonged to a religious communion of the State of New York in the character of an Established Church. My hon. and learned Friend will correct me if I am wrong; but I do not think that the Anglican Church was ever an Established Church in the State of New York as it was in Virginia, and therefore it was a private society in which this endowment was continued. Well, then, let us see how this case stands in other matters. My hon. and learned Friend by giving up the Establishment gives up the argument with regard to State religion and supremacy. Now, with respect to the means of spreading the doctrines of the Reformation, how does his plan recommend itself? If we are to maintain the Established Church for the purpose of spreading the doctrines of the Reformation, we ought to maintain it all the more assiduously and zealously in those places where it is improbable that it would be able to maintain itself. Even the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Gathorne Hardy) has come down somewhat from the high ground of last year, when he spoke of its being the glory of the Church to hold out the light of the Reformation all over Ireland, and he seems now to be disposed to withdraw—[MR. GATHORNE HARDY: No, no!]

Well, then, he does not withdraw, but wishes to keep it in every parish of the land; but my hon. and learned Friend does not propose to do so—and even if he were to have certain flying curates passing from one village to another, serving different congregations as they passed along in the course of the Sunday, my hon. and learned Friend will never tell me that this is the plan he would recommend for gaining proselytes, or the way he thinks the work of the Irish Church should be carried out.

Well, let me try the plan of my hon. and learned Friend by the rules of general prudence. When you have a fund to distribute, and have not enough for everybody, to whom are you to give it? Is it to those who want it and cannot do without it, or to those who do not want it and can supply themselves? I should certainly have thought that on those principles the proper course was the former; but my hon. and learned Friend's plan takes away funds from those scattered and poor Protestants on whose behalf appeals are constantly made to our commiseration, and gives it to those congregations which, according to every understood principle of reckoning in such matters, are capable of providing religious worship and religious instruction for themselves. Well, how does this plan stand as regards a great object which we have in view—namely, that of conciliating the Roman Catholic population of Ireland? My hon. and learned Friend must know that it is not the possession of a larger or smaller portion of these endowments as national endowments that is objected to by the Roman Catholic population. It is that they should be held by the Protestants at all, and if he ruthlessly cuts away a moiety of the endowments, but leaves the other moiety in their hands, the cause of offence remains, and all the festering recollections connected with it would still continue to afflict the mass of the Irish people. My hon. and learned Friend criticized the Bill with respect to the observance of the local principle. He quoted from a speech of mine a declaration in which I had said that in my opinion it was dangerously resembling an act of public plunder if—on the part of that handful of the Irish people who are in the possession of the ecclesiastical endowments—we were to take the tithes of a parish in Mayo or Galway to supply the wants of wealthy congregations in Dublin or Belfast; and he thought he had found—what I am quite sure he will be forward to admit when the matter is explained, he has not found—a great deviation in this Bill from that regard for the local purposes of these funds, which I had so strongly professed. If we had found it necessary to centralize those funds for a purpose of national and general benefit, it would have been a totally different matter from transferring them from the handful of Protestants in one neighbourhood for the uses of another handful in another; but we have done neither the one nor the other. I stated to the House in introducing the measure that, in our view, it was essential to the satisfactory character of any plan for disposing of the residue of the property that it should be equal in its application to the various parts of Ireland, and if my hon. and learned Friend examines the matter he will find that it is not possible to devise any scheme which shall more exactly re-distribute the benefit of these funds

than the scheme we have proposed. There is not one purpose to which we propose to apply them that does not reach over the whole of Ireland; there is not one purpose that does not regard and concern wants that are rising day by day in every parish of every county, nor is there one to which we do not propose by this plan to give an easy and practicable access to institutions which will be either maintained or assisted out of these funds. I am bound to say there yet remains one more objection to the plan of my hon. and learned Friend. If he retains these endowments in the wealthier parishes of Ireland, it is quite plain to me that he cannot give to the Irish Church that which I find it determined to assert for itself—namely, an absolute legal freedom—for he proposes to maintain benefices, and he will have to maintain the incidents of benefices, to maintain that part of the legal Church system which concerns the enjoyment of property under straight, rigid, and inflexible rules. Now, such retention of rules would, I am afraid, greatly interfere with that power of elastic adaptation of arrangements to wants and necessities all over Ireland to which members of the Established Church in Ireland look with sanguine hope as a principle enabling them to cope with the difficulties of the position. I therefore, Sir, feel bound to say that, great as is the respect which we have for the authority of my hon. and learned Friend, it appears to me that we should do wrong were we to deviate from the plans we have adopted in the direction which he indicates to us.

And here let me say a word with regard to the application of the funds to lunatic asylums in answer to what fell from the noble Lord the Member for Middlesex (Lord George Hamilton)—a word which I say with great satisfaction, because it affords me an agreeable opportunity of acknowledging the remarkable ability that distinguished his first address to the House. But the noble Lord has not examined into the case of these institutions. He stated that the money of the Church would be given to sectarian lunatic asylums of which he gave three or four examples. [Lord GEORGE HAMILTON: I said it might be.] I think the noble Lord, naturally perhaps, assuming that we could not have any other but the worst and darkest intentions, went a little further and said they would be so applied. But those three instances named by the noble Lord were not instances of lunatic asylums at all, but were instances of hospitals which would not come within the provisions of the Bill. Now, instead of replying in detail on such a point, I would simply say this—that in the whole application of these residuary funds there is not involved the adoption of a single principle which is new to Parliament. If we are told that reformatories are not fit to receive any portion of these funds because reformatories are denominational, my answer is that these reformatories receive from year to year grants of the public money voted by Parliament; and if they are fit to receive money contributed by the taxpayers of the three countries they are fit to receive money proceeding from the Church funds of Ireland. With regard to lunatic asylums, those asylums are exclusively governed by persons who are appointed by the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland—that is to say, by officers who are responsible to Parliament. With respect to county infirmaries, the noble Lord knows very well that although these institutions are very ill-governed at present, yet they are under government of a legal character, which must be fixed and appointed by us, and which must be under any new and amended system—if our policy is allowed to have its way—of a perfectly impartial and secular description.

Well, Sir, there is more that I should have liked to have said, were it not that the hands of the clock warn me that I ought to hasten to a close; and I will, therefore, proceed to what—to use a phrase that I am afraid has given some offence, although it was not used with the intention of giving any—I may call the “winding up” of my speech; but I applied the phrase “winding up” to these money arrangements because it is one which I thought conveniently expressed what I meant. This measure has been—and I do not much complain of it—the object undoubtedly of very hard words—sacrilege, spoliation, perfidy. All these and two more have been used; to which two I will now refer, because they were used by my right hon. Friend the Member for North Devon (Sir Stafford Northcote) at a Conservative dinner, unless he be wronged by the reporters, on the 3rd of March, when he delivered a speech on this subject, which appears to me more highly seasoned than the one he addressed to the House. If I might venture to express an opinion on such a matter, I would recommend that when hon. Gentlemen have strong things to say about public measures the best place is to say them in this House.

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE: I shall be quite prepared to say it here at the proper time.

MR. GLADSTONE: I should say the proper time was in the course of this debate. I want to refer to his remarks, because I am satisfied with and somewhat proud of them. My right hon. Friend said that when the English people understand the measure they will feel that it is unparalleled in its character, and that it combines a gigantic scheme of robbery, with a still worse system of bribery. Those words have given satisfaction to me for two reasons. In the first place, because my right hon. Friend, having used those words, cannot possibly hereafter use any others that are worse, and therefore we know that we have touched the bottom. I have another source of satisfaction. It is just the kind of delineation and picture which, when drawn by a hostile hand, shows me that we have succeeded in the framing of our measure. When my right hon. Friend says we have committed robbery, what he means is that we have been faithful to the principles of disestablishment and general disendowment which we announced last year, and which we professed to our constituents; and when he says we have committed bribery he means that, in the application of those principles, we have studied carefully and to the best of our ability to ensure that there should be every mitigation and every softening which they could receive in their practical application. Therefore I accept the involuntary but most conclusive testimony given by my right hon. Friend that the spirit in which we have proceeded, as one, among a variety of evidences afforded me by the demeanour of the House, that they think the Government has not failed in embodying in this important measure the main considerations which it was their duty to include in it.

I have nothing else to say which is essential or material. I wish to release this House; and I will therefore conclude by thanking the House for the patience with which they have listened.

to me at this advanced hour of the night or of the morning, whichever we may think fit to call it. As the clock points rapidly towards the dawn, so we are rapidly flowing out the years, the months, the days, that remain to the existence of the Irish Established Church. An hon. Member last night assured us, speaking, I have no doubt, his own honest conviction, that we were but at the beginning of this question. I believe that not only every man who sits on this side of the House, but every man who sits on that, carries within his breast a silent monitor, which tells him that this controversy is fast moving to a close. It is for the interest of us all that we should not keep this Establishment of religion in a prolonged agony. Nothing can come from that prolongation but an increase of pain, an increase of exasperation, and a diminution of that temper which now happily prevails—a temper which is disposed to mitigate the adjustment of this great question in its details. There may also come from that prolongation the very evil which the right hon. Gentleman opposite made it a charge against us that we were labouring to produce, but which we think likely to be rather the probable consequence of his line of argument—namely, the drawing into this Irish controversy that English question which we conceive to be wholly different. We think so, because, although in the two countries there may be and there are Establishments of religions, we never can admit that an Establishment which we think, in the main, good and efficient for its purposes, is to be regarded as being endangered by the course which we may adopt in reference to an Establishment which we look upon as being inefficient and bad. The day, therefore, it seems to me, is rapidly approaching when this controversy will come to an end, and I feel that I am not wrong in appealing to that silent witness to the justice of my anticipations which I am satisfied exists on both sides of the House. Not now are we opening this great question. Opened, perhaps, it was, when the Parliament which expired last year pronounced upon it that emphatic judgment which can never be recalled. Opened it was, further, when in the months of autumn the discussions which were held in every quarter of the country turned mainly on the subject of the Irish Church. Prosecuted another stage it was, when the completed elections discovered to us a manifestation of the national verdict more emphatic than, with the rarest exceptions, has been witnessed during the whole of our Parliamentary history. The good cause was further advanced towards its triumphant issue when the silent acknowledgment of the late Government that they declined to contest the question was given by their retirement from Office, and their choosing a less responsible position from which to carry on a more desultory warfare against the policy which they had in the previous Session unsuccessfully attempted to resist. Another blow will soon be struck in the same good cause, and I will not intercept it one single moment more.
